Community assists tsunami victims

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish community has joined the massive relief effort directed toward victims of the tsunami that has ravaged southeast Asia.

Money from Jewish organizations and local federations in Canada and the United States is being funnelled through the American Joint Distribution Committee and disaster relief agencies associated with the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief, "on behalf of all victims, regardless of religion," UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said in a statement.

The coalition, consisting of 45 agencies, responds to catastrophic events. UJA Federation is a member of the coalition through United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for North American Jewish federations.

Much of the money collected will be used for food, water purification equipment, blankets, medical supplies and assistance, water containers, plastic sheeting for shelter, and body bags to deal with the rising death toll.

As this article went to press Dec. 30, more than 120,000 people had been confirmed dead, and concern was being expressed about the need to deal with potential after-effects, such as outbreaks of typhoid fever, diarrhea, and respiratory diseases caused by contaminated drinking water, as well as malaria from mosquitoes, and hypothermia, tetanus or infection from trauma and lack of shelter.

News in Brief

CANADA

New NIF Head

TORONTO — Jay Brodbar has been named executive director of the New Israel Fund of Canada. NIF, a 25-year-old partnership of Israelis, North Americans and Europeans, addresses issues of tolerance, social and economic gaps, and civil and human rights for all Israelis. Brodbar, 54, had been research director of NADbank, the research arm of the Canadian daily newspaper industry. Before that, he served as director of research, assistant director community planning and allocations, at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where he co-ordinated community planning efforts.

Group Seeks Firing

TORONTO — A media watchdog group wants the CBC to drop reporter Neil Macdonald because it says he's anti-Israel. HonestReporting.com said Macdonald displayed pro-Palestinian bias when he was Mideast correspondent for CBC Television, and that the bias continues now that he's Washington correspondent. In his new posting, Macdonald has continued to "indulge his apparent preoccupation with the Jewish state," the group's Dov Smith wrote in an opinion piece in the National Post last month, citing instances where he felt Macdonald went out of his way to criticize Israel in stories where it had little apparent relevance.

Bowling for Palestine?

NEW YORK — Strike Holdings, which owns bowling alleys in New York City, Long Island, Miami and Bethesda, Md., said it is returning $1.3 million that Yasser Arafat invested in the firm without its knowledge, Associated Press reported. The late Palestinian leader made the investment through a holding company he created called Onyx Funds. One of the bowling alleys, Bowlmor Lanes in Greenwich Village, is a popular site for bar and bat mitzvah parties.

AP Reviews Ties

WASHINGTON — The Associated Press said it will review its arrangement with Al-Manar, Hezbollah's satellite TV station, after it was placed on the U.S. Justice Department's terrorist list. The station employs a single freelancer in the United States, who occasionally uses AP Television News facilities in Washington, D.C., to transmit material. An AP spokesperson said its contract with Al-Manar will be reviewed "in light of the State Department ruling."

Anti-Semitic Incidents

MOSCOW — Three cases of anti-Semitic violence occurred in Moscow last month. On Dec. 16, Mikhail Yusupov, 24, an Israeli citizen and native of Dagestan, was stabbed on a Moscow tram and wounded in his lung after three young Russians asked him about his ethnicity. He is in stable condition in a Moscow hospital. Two attackers are under arrest. In a separate incident Dec. 23, an Orthodox Israeli Jew was beaten near the Marina Roscha Synagogue, the largest Jewish facility in Moscow. And on Dec. 12, police verbally and physically assaulted a driver employed by the Jewish community who was displaying a menorah on top of his car.

Ex-JTA Editor Dies

NEW YORK — Murray Zuckoff, editor-in-chief of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency from 1969 to 1987, died Dec. 26 in New York of lung cancer at 79. Before JTA, the New York-born Zuckoff worked at the Morning Call in Paterson, N.J., and he was later an editor of Midstream magazine.

Canadians Win Battle to Regain Looted Art

PRAGUE — A Canadian family's 10-year legal battle to have more than 20 Nazi-looted paintings by European masters returned to them is a major step closer to a successful end after a verbal ruling last month in the Czech Republic.

A judge in Pribram, a town 100 kilometres east of Prague, ruled in favour of Toronto's Andrew Federer, 42, the grandson of Oskar Federer and a banker with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce who is leading the battle to have the paintings returned. The unappraised works, which include pieces by Edvard Munch and Gustav Klimt, have been housed for more than a half-century in two small public galleries – one in Pribram and another farther east in the town of Ostrava.

In 1939, Oskar Federer, who ran the Rothschild-owned Vitkovice Iron and Mining Company, managed to flee Nazi-occupied Czechoslovakia to join his wife and children in Canada. But he could only smuggle out four out of more than 130 works in his art collection, which included pieces by van Gogh, Renoir, Cézanne and Manet. Most of the works are unaccounted for, but the Nazis seized many and loaned them to a new gallery in Ostrava. The Communists took power in 1948 and decided to keep them in the galleries, then resisted restitution efforts – first by Oskar Federer, who died in 1968, and then by his family under post-Communist laws.

Appeals mean it could be 2008 before the works are returned, if ever, the Globe and Mail reported.

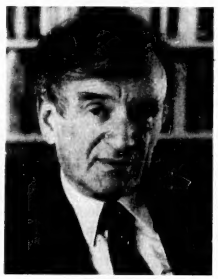
Wiesel optimistic about peace in post-Arafat era

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Elie Wiesel, Holocaust survivor, renowned international writer, professor emeritus of Boston University, and Nobel Peace Prize-winner, has fought a fierce battle for 50 years against barbarism, totalitarianism, social injustice and the danger of forgetting history.



Elie Wiesel

Wiesel's latest book, Et où vas-tu? (Éditions du Seuil), was recently published. It is a remarkable collection of texts in which Wiesel gives us his thoughts on some biblical themes and current, hotly debated topics: anti-Semitism, war, hate, Israel, the challenges faced by Europe, the duty to remember, and the future of youth.

One of the most illustrious intellectual and humanistic figures of our time, Wiesel recently spoke to The Canadian Jewish News in an exclusive, wide-ranging interview.

Canadian Jewish News: For you, "Europe is first and foremost a memory." However, faced with the increase in anti-Semitism throughout Europe in recent years, one would think that Europeans have developed amnesia.

Elie Wiesel: I believe that being European means claiming responsibility for all the memories that both enriched and humiliated the people who, in that small area of the planet, often proved to be armed messengers of death, although sometimes, but rarely, they were also the bearers of civilizing culture and therefore of promise for humanity.

The increase of anti-Semitism in Europe concerns me greatly. I am shocked and upset every time I learn that anti-Semitic expressions have been used, that swastikas have been daubed on walls, that synagogues or Jewish community centres have been burned in European cities. These things make me feel sick.

But we Jews must be careful to avoid generalizations. You cannot say that Europe at the beginning of the third millennium is an anti-Semitic continent. It is true that there are anti-Semites in Europe as elsewhere, but I don't like to generalize. It goes against my principles.

European memory has not become amnesic. Rather, the memory of the anti-Semites in Europe has been revived. It's a fundamental question that we cannot evade. How many of these confirmed anti-Semites are there? Who do they represent? What is their goal? These are important, urgent questions.

CJN: You regularly meet with heads of state and of European governments. How do they react to this renewal of Judeophobia?

Wiesel: They are very disturbed by this resurgence of anti-Semitism. I have spoken with French President Jacques Chirac about the issue several times. This wave of anti-Semitism bothers him a great deal. It also makes him feel badly to know that there are people in the world today who don't like France because, rightly or wrongly, they feel that the country has taken a path that is less than noble. Today, in France, the police protect synagogues, schools, cultural centres and Jewish community centres. Chirac and his government are doing everything they can to fight this wave of anti-Semitism. But, at the same time, we must admit that if it is necessary to use such measures, it means the Jews feel threatened.

CJN: European governments seem powerless in the face of this spread of anti-Semitism. How can they fight it?

Wiesel: If someone had told me when I was young that I would have to fight this battle today, I would have shouted out that it was impossible. Now, here I am again right in the thick of it. How does one disarm the anti-Semite? It's a question I have never stopped raising in the many world conferences I am invited to.

Four very intense days

From the editor's desk

For the past five years in mid-December, as one calendar year falls away and another takes its place, the Interdisciplinary Center of Herzliya (IDC) has convened a wide-ranging policy conference on what its organizers call "the balance of Israel's national security."

Founded in 1994, the IDC is Israel's first private university. It focuses on research and teaching, and it places great theoretical and applied emphasis on social commitment for its faculty and students.

Now in its fifth year, the Herzliya Conference, as it is called, is regarded among key decision-makers in Israel – academic, business, media and government – as the pre-eminent annual forum for exchanging views, networking with foreign colleagues and, in the case of government officials, announcing new policy initiatives.

In 2003, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon chose the occasion of the Herzliya Conference to announce his plan to unilaterally disengage from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank. As reported in the last issue of The CJN, political pundits and policy professionals in Israel were somewhat disappointed that Sharon did not similarly seize the opportunity to announce yet another new initiative when he addressed the 2004 conference on Dec. 16.

But even though the prime minister made no new policy announcements, readers should not be left with the impression that the conference was merely a run-of-the-mill colloquium by academics and other policy wonks on esoteric matters.

The conference, which The CJN attended, was a high-level convention in which new and old ideas were presented and debated – sometimes calmly, often very heatedly – from eight in the morning until nearly 10 at night over four very intense days. It was, in my imagination, like a kitchen in an exclusive, but popular, high-traffic restaurant, where the stove is constantly lit, and numerous pots filled with stews, soups and other concoctions are always bubbling and their contents are served to a never-satiated public.

More than 1,000 people attended the gathering. Dr. Uzi Arad, conference chair and director of the IDC's Institute for Policy and Strategy, explained its purpose by saying it was "vital to arrive at correct readings of the strategic landscape" facing Israel.

That landscape was defined very broadly to encompass political, military, social, economic, governmental, regional, global and Diaspora aspects of the terrain.

In typically unencumbered Israeli fashion, no subject was considered too sensitive. Thus, sessions were held on national intelligence and decision-making, nuclear proliferation, allocating responsibilities between government and civil society, national policy toward Israel's Arab community, deepening Israel-EU relations, upgrading relations with NATO, the "road map" peace plan, and a great many more subjects.

Among those who addressed the conference were Sharon, President Moshe Katsav, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, Minister for Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky, Labor Party leader Shimon Peres and Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon.

A number of foreign leaders and decision-makers also spoke to the gathering. Some of the more prominent among them were Nicolas Sarkozy, president of the Union pour le Mouvement Populaire in France; Ambassador Peter Ricketts, the United Kingdom's permanent representative to NATO; Marc Otte, the EU's special representative to the Mideast peace process; and Prof. Philip Zelikow, executive director of the 9/11 Commission.

Stockwell Day, Conservative MP for Okanagan-Coquihalla, was one of a handful of Canadians who attended the conference. He was clearly impressed with the uninhibited nature and the far-reaching sweep of the conference. "I always knew there was a wide range of views [on the many complex issues facing Israel], but to be able to explore them in depth has been very helpful," he told The CJN.

"I have learned things here that will be very helpful to push the government to have its policy more clearly, consistently and coherently reflect and protect Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state."

It is folly to single out one presentation when so many were exceptional. But the talk by Gabriel (Gabi) Ben-Dor, a professor of political science and director of the National Security Studies Center at the University of Haifa, warrants special mention, because it also applies to the Canadian context. He spoke about the social component of national security, reporting on the results of a poll regarding "subjective" indicators of feelings of security among some 18,000 Israelis.

Ben-Dor found that the institutions most trusted by Israelis were the army, the security services and the Supreme Court. By contrast, the least trusted institutions were political parties, politicians and the media.

"The main challenge for Israeli society," he concluded, "is to increase trust and belief in the political structures and institutions."

I saw Day take special note of Ben-Dor's conclusions.

It was a fascinating but exhausting four days.

Trust fund opened to help Baranovsky family

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A trust fund to provide financial assistance to the family of Vitaly Baranovsky has been launched at a North York bank.

The trust account will be open for a few weeks to permit contributions by all those affected by the tragic news of the death of Vitaly's 10-year-old son, Daniel Olephir-Baranovsky, in a traffic accident, said Vardit Zafri, a Toronto-area woman who helped create the account.

"It is important to note that Vitaly Baranovsky is the sole supporter of the family," Zafri said. "He suffered internal injuries and just recently successfully underwent an eight-hour operation to reconstruct his knees. He will need yet another operation."

Daniel killed in traffic accident

Daniel was the half-brother of Matti Baranovski (the two families spell the names differently), who was beaten to death in 1999 by a group of teens over a pack of cigarettes.

On Dec. 12, 2004 Vitaly Baranovsky, 45, was travelling northbound on Dufferin Avenue when the driver of an oncoming SUV lost control of her vehicle and crashed head on with the Baranovsky's Honda Civic. Daniel was killed on the scene and Vitaly was taken to Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre with critical injuries.

As of The CJN's press time, he had not yet been told of his son's death. His wife, Lilly, remains by his side.

News of Daniel's death and Vitaly's injuries shocked Zafri, who first met them during the shiva for Matti.

"I couldn't sleep at night," she said, "not because I had close ties to the family, but because... I'm a mother and I care.

"To lose one child is unimaginable. To lose two children, well, there are no words," she said.

The tragedy brought back memories of her own experience 10 years ago. "I saw how important it was for the kindness of others when my ex-husband died when my daughter was 12 years old," she said.

Zafri came up with the idea of a trust fund and instead of waiting for someone else to do it, "I decided I'd take it upon myself."

She approached her branch of the RBC Royal Bank at 5968 Bathurst St. (at Cedarcroft), and with the help of Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, opened the account. The trust account is in the name of Daniel's 21-month-old brother, David Olephir-Baranovsky.

The transit number is 05172 and the account number is 508 4512.

Jewish community aid tsunami victims

Canadian Jewish Congress is asking that donations to the Tsunami Disaster Relief Fund be made to local federations, or to UIA Canada. Donations to UIA Canada can be sent to 4600 Bathurst St., 3rd Floor, Toronto, Ont. M2R 3V2, or made by telephone at 416-636-7655.

"Our hearts go out to the victims of this disaster, and to those who have survived and are now in the process of searching for their loved ones," CJC national president Ed Morgan said in a statement. "We hope and pray that the relief efforts of those countries physically untouched by this tragedy will bring comfort to where it is so desperately needed."

Leslie Gales, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, echoed Morgan's concern. "This is one of the greatest catastrophes in history," she said. "Our community's response will, I'm sure, be swift and generous."

In Toronto, cheques should be made out to the Tsunami Disaster Relief Fund, care of UJA Federation, and mailed to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, 4600 Bathurst St., Toronto. M2R 3V2. Pledges can also be made on the organization's website, www.jewishtoronto.com, or by phone at 416-631-5705. Credit cards are accepted.

Pledges can also be made on the organization's website, www.jewishtoronto.com

In Montreal, FEDERATION CJA has set up its own fund. To contribute, call 514-345-2645, ext. 3344 or 3343.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver is also accepting donations. Call 604-257-5100, or contribute online at www.jfav.com.

The Hamilton Jewish Federation has also set up an emergency fundraising mechanism. Federation president Leslie Lasky said that "every dollar raised through this Jewish communal effort will go to provide urgent assistance to the survivors across all the affected countries."

To donate using cheques, cash or credit cards, contact the office at 905-648-0605, or e-mail gfisheruja@on.aibn.com.

The Toronto-based Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee has established an Asian Earthquake Relief Fund. Donations can be made by phone at 416-964-7698, ext. 13; by mail, Ve'ahavta Asian Earthquake Relief Fund, 22 Balliol St., Suite #108, Toronto, M4S 1C1; or online at www.veahavta.org.

Besides contributing to the fund set up by the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief, Ve'ahavta also plans to assist Israeli relief operations that are already underway, and to collect and send relief goods. At press time, the organization was also considering sending medical personnel or other individuals who can help in a crisis environment.

This is not the first time Ve'ahavta has stepped in for disaster relief. It has also worked in such places as El Salvador, Iran, Ethiopia, Turkey, and Kosovo. In Toronto, it is known for offering aid to street people, the poor and the homeless.

Support specifically for Jews in Thailand caught up in the disaster, as well as for the many Israelis travelling there, is being co-ordinated by Chabad of Thailand, headed by shaliach and local spiritual leader Rabbi Yosef Kantor. He has sent Rabbi Nehemya Wilhelm to Phuket, one of the major disaster sites, and turned the three Chabad Houses in the country into crisis and communication centres.

Chabad is providing medical help, meals and financial assistance, and Chabad volunteers are standing by at local hospitals to provide kosher food and any other help needed, as well as trauma counselling.

Thailand is a popular destination for young Israelis taking a break after their army service, and Chabad is helping them communicate with their families and friends in Israel, and helping Israelis make inquiries about people in the region.

Contributions to help Chabad Lubavitch efforts in Thailand can be sent to local Chabad centres. In Toronto, contact Chabad Lubavitch, 770 Chabad Gate, Thornhill, Ont., L4J 3V9, 905-731-7000.

At press time, B'nai Brith Canada indicated that it will not establish its own relief fund, and is advising people to contact already existing efforts.

Donations can also be directed to the Canadian Red Cross and local police stations.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee is working with its office in Mumbai (formerly Bombay) and elsewhere in the area to co-ordinate relief efforts.

As of The CJN's press time, the world's richest nations had pledged more than $250 million in immediate aid – including $35 million from the United States, $40 million from Ottawa, $5 million from Ontario and $8 million from British Columbia.

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In most ways, seven-year-old Jaimie Nackan is like her peers. She loves to dance, relishes painting and dreams of starring in The Nutcracker ballet when she grows up.

Jaimie Nackan

But as much as Jaimie seems like everyone else, she is different. The Richmond Hill, Ont., resident suffers from anaphylaxis, a potentially life-threatening allergic reaction in which the person affected is unable to breathe. About one to two per cent of Canadians suffer from the condition.

For Jaimie, there are more than a dozen foods that can trigger the severe reaction. The olive-skinned child with curly brown hair has been rushed to the hospital on more than one occasion, struggling to breathe because of the food she ate.

As a means of coping, Jaimie, with the encouragement of her parents, Lisa and Allan, has written and illustrated a book about what it's like to live with anaphylaxis. Jaimie has called it The book a bawt alrges, her spelling for "The book about allergies."

"My name is Jaimie. I have lots of allergies," Jaimie writes.

She provides a detailed, colourful picture illustrating her symptoms, and then writes, "This is what happens when I get allergies. Hives and itch, I can't breathe, I feel scared, I cry, I cough, I get swollen."

While the book is one of the few positives to come out of Jaimie's illness, Lisa says parents and children haven't always been supportive. In some cases, they have pegged Jaimie's problem as an inconvenience for them.

"That's what I find the hardest to deal with," Lisa says, relating a story about parents complaining when a "no milk" policy was implemented at the studio where Jaimie dances.

"I started to hear things about people being annoyed because this was an inconvenience to them... Then a father said, 'Your daughter shouldn't be coming to the dance studio.'"

Some children become jealous or resentful after seeing Jaimie receive "special" food.

In the interest of safety, Lisa remains at the studio for the entire four hours that Jaimie is there, prepares all of Jaimie's food and has designed and posted warning signs throughout the facility.

The studio has responded by spearheading an educational program about allergies.

"They're reading books to the kids about allergies, which I think is phenomenal," Lisa says. "The kids have also drawn pictures for Jaimie, which was amazing."

The Nackans first recognized that Jaimie had a significant health problem when they started feeding her solid foods as a baby and she had negative reactions.

"Milk is her most serious allergy, so when we fed her yogurt or whatever it was, she was red around the mouth the first time," Lisa says.

"The second reaction was quite a bit worse as she got hives. The third time it was projectile vomit and the fourth time she had difficulty with breathing."

When Jaimie was about a year old, an allergist pinpointed specific food allergies. The Nackans were then provided with a list of foods and ingredients Jaimie must avoid. They were also given an EpiPen containing epinephrine. They were to use it to give an injection that would reverse the negative cardiovascular effects of an anaphylactic reaction and help to dilate the airways.

The Nackans then became involved with Anaphylaxis Canada. Although Jaimie, Lisa and Allan have become highly educated and cautious, accidents have periodically landed Jaimie in the emergency room. For instance, when Jaimie was three, Lisa fed her soya cheese, not aware at the time that soya was one of her allergies.

Jaimie's reaction started quickly, but Lisa decided to hold off on injecting the EpiPen, since they live close to a local hospital.

Allan and Lisa both emphasize not administering the EpiPen was a mistake.

"The key lifesaving message is, the earlier you give [the EpiPen], the more effective it can be," Allan says.

At the hospital, the reaction subsided, and Jaimie was given an antihistamine drug called Benadryl and sent home after only 20 minutes.

My name is Jaimie. I am six years old. I like ballet and I love Harry Potter and Lego. My favourite ballet is The Nutcracker, and I want to be Clara and dance in The Nutcracker when I'm big. I like painting.

My whole life, I have had food allergies. They are to milk, eggs, fish, beans, peas, lentils, sesame, soya, peanut, mustard seed, banana and avocado. My worst allergy is the milk allergy because milk is in so many things. I have been to the hospital three times because of my milk allergy.

The good thing is that we've seen how quickly the EpiPen works. It is not fair, because I can't eat what other kids eat, like chocolate and Dunkaroos. I tried chocolate without milk, but it tasted really yucky.

Lots of people don't understand about milk allergy because they think it's the same as lactose intolerance. My uncle is lactose intolerant and he just gets a tummy ache from having milk. When I've have stuff with milk in it, I cough, I cry, I get swollen, I get hives, I can't breath and I get scared. And I have to have my EpiPen and go to hospital.

The good thing about my allergies is that my mommy organizes hot dog day at school every week and stays with me each hot dog day.

My mommy also stays with me for four hours while I do ballet, tap and jazz, because the other children bring snacks and I don't feel safe. At my ballet recital, somebody spilled coffee on my jazz leotard. We were very lucky my mom noticed because I can get an allergy just from touching milk.

When I get a loot bag, if there is candy in, my mom has to take it out. I wish nobody put candy in loot bags. When we were in South Africa, I asked my mom what my brother's caramel ice-cream tastes like and she said it was not good.

We must all help

The photo accompanying this editorial conveys the heart-rending pity for a child left all alone. The youngster survived the devastation of the tsunami on Dec. 26 in Cuddalore, about 180 kilometres south of the Indian city of Madras. He clutches a fresh article of dry clothing given to him by a volunteer aid organization. But where is his family?

Countless thousands of human beings have now washed ashore, their discoloured bodies bloated by drowning, their limbs frozen into their final misshapen positions.

As of this writing, more than 114,000 people have been counted among the dead. Thousands more are missing or at risk of death from the water-borne bacteria polluting the lands washed under those massive, murderous waves.

To be sure, the most suffering was visited upon the most exposed and the most vulnerable: the poor villagers of the countries whose shores were inundated by the sudden surging water. But among the tens of thousands of people dead or missing were thousands of people from all parts of the world who were vacationing in the region. The New York Times reported that the deaths cover "at least 40 nationalities."

Canadians, too, as we know, perished in the deadly deluge.

The tsunami struck southeast Asia, but there are also many homes very far away in North America, Europe and Australasia where candles of remembrance now burn for the souls of loved ones lost forever to the nightmare of nature's random violence.

More than a week after the terrible event, people were still reported missing from Sweden, Norway, New Zealand, Denmark, the Czech Republic, Germany, Italy and Israel. Some observers have called the drownings and devastation the worst natural disaster in history. The number of people killed is expected to rise dramatically. But the number of families destroyed will never be able to be counted.

The photo of the young Indian child may indeed be incapable of conveying the totality of the horror that happened on Dec. 26, but it does eloquently, painfully, convey the needy and suffering humanity, of which we are part, that now cries out to us for help.

If it is true, as our sages taught, that kindness is the highest form of wisdom, then we must now all of us act wisely – but quickly – to try to help relieve the suffering of the tsunami survivors.

We must help as we can. But help we all must.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Same-sex marriage

In response to the article "Liberal rabbis welcome same-sex marriage finding," in your Dec. 16 issue, the following represents the official policy of the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario Region.

Unlike friendship and other interpersonal relationships, marriage is sacred. Marriage is called "kiddushin" in Hebrew, from the root, "kaddosh," meaning "holy."

Marriage as a sacred rite is defined by Jewish law as a union between a man and a woman. We believe this to be the foundation not only of Jewish society, but also of human society in general.

While the state may legislate whatever financial and other benefits it deems appropriate for homosexual couples, we object when such legislation equates a same-sex union with the sacramental status of marriage. It would be a grave mistake to tamper with the foundations of our society: heterosexual marriage and family.

Pierre Berton on anti-Semitism in T.O.

Congratulations on publishing articles by Pierre Berton in Maclean's magazine, written in 1948, regarding the state of anti-Semitism in Toronto ("No Jews need apply," Dec. 16, Dec. 23). It gave your readers an opportunity to see another facet of this Canadian icon. He was truly a mensch, and very pro-Jewish. In fact, one of his sons, Peter, married into a Jewish family.

History of day school funding in Quebec

In the Dec. 16 issue, The CJN reported that Jewish day schools can enter into "associate status" with two Montreal area school boards ("Quebec day schools get funding boost"). The announcement was greeted with scarcely a ripple in Quebec.

From the late 1800s, however, almost to our time, the "Jewish school question" was a burning issue. It was an issue in municipal and Quebec politics, and it brought forth demonstrations and physical violence. Sermons were given in Protestant and Catholic churches, and it resulted in a split in the Jewish community.

The Committee for Tax Supported Jewish Schools, formed in the early 1960s, worked outside established Jewish institutions to secure public funding for our schools. About 35 years ago, when Quebec finally gave grants to the schools, the committee disbanded.

Perhaps the example of the Quebec Committee for Tax Supported Jewish Schools can serve the Ontario Jewish community. As you conclude in your editorial (Dec. 16), "To its ongoing shame, Ontario – the largest and one of the wealthiest provinces in Canada – remains the only province in Canada that extends no direct funding assistance to the day schools within its jurisdiction or to the parents of the children who attend these schools."

Pollution in Israel

Sheldon Kirshner's article in your Dec. 2 edition on "The battle to preserve Israel's environment" could not have been more timely. Referring to the research and thoughts of Alon Tal (Pollution in a Promised Land) and his own, he makes three points: economic development is leaving Israel with a legacy of environmental disaster; Israel even today is overcrowded; and environmentalists ought to embrace the Jewish National Fund as an ally.

The JNF does balance development with beautification and conservation of the land. Today, its specific mandate is to develop the Negev in anticipation of hundreds of thousands of people making homes there. If the JNF is to succeed, Jews must embrace this challenge as enthusiastically as Zionists embraced the need to "reclaim the land" in the last century. Israel can continue to be a homeland for Jews everywhere only if it has the capacity to absorb them in a healthy, unpolluted environment. The JNF is committed to development while conserving and enhancing Israel's natural beauty. The time is now. Join us in meeting this great and exciting challenge.

President, Jewish National Fund of Toronto

Perspectives

Judaism and vegetarianism

PRO

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

The Jewish Vegetarians of North America recently published their "Top 10 Reasons for Being a Kosher Vegetarian." First on the list: "Two words – buttered challah!" I welcomed this moment of levity about an issue that often generates a tremendous amount of passion on both sides of the table. When the plates are cleared, though, it seems to me that there are some compelling Jewish reasons for shifting our diets toward vegetarianism.

Rabbi Michael Skobac

Understanding the Torah's portrayal of both the beginning and climax of history is helpful in formulating a Jewish perspective on the issue of vegetarianism. Man's original diet in the Garden of Eden did not include the flesh of animals. "And God said: 'Behold I have given you every herb-yielding seed which is upon the face of the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed – to you it shall be for food.'" (Genesis 1:29)

When God led the Jewish people out of Egypt in their journey toward the Promised Land, He sustained them for 40 years without meat on a diet of manna from heaven. Based on these two passages, Rabbi Isaac Arama asserted in his Akedat Yitzchak (15th century) that the ideal human diet would be vegetarian.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the chief rabbi of pre-state Israel, wrote about vegetarianism ultimately emerging as the human standard in the idyllic Messianic future. His tract A Vision of Vegetarianism and Peace views the permission given to mankind to consume meat as a concession that would be transcended in the future. To support this, he cites the passage: "I will make a covenant for them with the animals of the field, the birds of the air, and the creeping things of the ground; I will also banish the bow and sword, and war from the land." (Hosea 2:20)

Rav Kook's successor, Rabbi Isaac Halevi Herzog, wrote that "Jews will move increasingly to vegetarianism out of their deepening knowledge of what their tradition commands." The ethical treatment of animals in Judaism is primarily an issue of human responsibility rather than one of animal rights. The Bible prohibits "tzaar baalei chaim" – causing any needless pain to animals. The Torah also contains numerous injunctions that govern how we treat our animals, including the prohibition against plowing with two different sized species (Deuteronomy 22:10), the requirement to feed our animals before we eat (Deuteronomy 11:15) and the prohibition of muzzling animals employed to thresh our fields (Deuteronomy 25:4).

According to Maimonides' Guide to the Perplexed, Rabbi Moshe Cordovero's Tomer Devorah and numerous other sources, the Torah's method of ritual slaughter was designed to kill animals as humanely and painlessly as possible. Unfortunately, the conditions under which animals are raised commercially for food production today (crowding, lack of fresh air, and painful shackling and hoisting prior to slaughter) routinely violates the prohibition of "tzaar baalei chaim." It is hardly consistent to abuse animals from birth and then only be concerned about minimizing their pain when we end their lives. Until these objectionable practices are cleaned up, the consumption of mistreated animals should be questioned.

Even more basic to Jewish values than compassion for animals is the primacy of human life. The ultimate value that Torah places on human life leads to the principle of pikuach nefesh – with three notable exceptions, we violate every Jewish law whenever there is the possibility of saving a life. The biblical directive to "carefully guard your souls" (Deuteronomy 4:15) is understood as an urging to do everything possible to maintain our health.

The Talmud (Chulin 10a) even teaches us to be more concerned about the potential health risks of a food than whether it is kosher. Many people go to extraordinary lengths to ensure the kashrut of their food, but pay little attention to whether it may be unhealthy. Today, the critical role diet plays in health is well-known. Animal products high in saturated fats and cholesterol have been linked to heart disease, stroke and various cancers. The widespread use of growth hormones, antibiotics and other chemicals in the meat production industry pose additional health concerns. Research has shown the positive relationship between vegetarian diets and longevity. This should certainly affect our responsibility to carefully weigh the costs and health benefits of everything that we consume.

Humans are also charged to care for and maintain the earth's environment (Kohelet Rabbah 7:28) and Jewish law strictly prohibits needlessly wasting or destroying anything that has potential value (baal tashchit). Ecologists have demonstrated the inefficiency of using so much of the earth's resources to support meat-centred diets, not to mention the huge amounts of waste and pollution that are by-products of modern meat production. And lest we forget, there are still countless people in the world today who suffer from malnutrition and starvation. Might the limited amounts of land and water available feed more people if they were used for growing grains and other crops rather than raising beef cattle?

I don't know if these issues necessitate the total elimination of meat from our diets. But it seems clear to me that Jews who seek to order their lives according to the teachings of our religion need to at least give some serious thought to these questions.

Rabbi Michael Skobac is education director with Jews for Judaism in Toronto.

CON

By RABBI DAVID BAUMAN

With only four days until the fast of Tisha b'Av, my family received an invitation for Shabbat lunch at a friend's house. Our friend posed the question in the following way: "We would love to have you over for Shabbat lunch this week, but you should know that our custom is to eat fleishig [meat] on the Shabbat during the nine days [before Tisha b'Av]. Are you comfortable with this?"

Rabbi David Bauman

The conversation was a commentary on the Jewish consumption of meat. During the nine-day period that opens the month of Menachem Av, Jews refrain from consuming meat products as a mourning ritual recalling the destruction of the two Temples in Jerusalem. The Mishnah tractate Ta'anit teaches us that "when Av comes in, gladness must be diminished" (4:6). We diminish our gladness during this period of national mourning by not eating meat or drinking wine, except on Shabbat and a festive meal (Shulchan Aruch O.H. 651:9). This Mishnah conveys an overriding principle of Judaism: holiness is obtained by restricting our behaviour.

This lesson is highlighted on the festival of Shavuot, when we again refrain from eating meat. The Mishnah Berurah (a 19th-century commentary on the Shulchan Aruch by Rabbi Israel Meir Ha-Kohen, the Chofetz Chaim) offers an explanation, by way of a midrash, that the dietary laws were established at the time of the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. When the Israelites came home from Mount Sinai, they could not eat meat because they had none that was prepared in the appropriate kosher manner. To prepare new meat properly would take too long. They had no choice but to eat dairy foods (Shulchan Aruch O.H. 494:2, Mishnah Berurah 12). Having experienced God's revelation at Mount Sinai, the Israelites yearned to continue that experience after God revealed his instructions. Therefore, they restricted their behaviour until they could act in the appropriate fashion. Rabbi Ismar Schorsch supports this understanding by teaching an enduring lesson of Halachah (Jewish Law): "the culinary practice of refraining from meat products is that dairy products are less self-indulgent. We restrain ourselves from the moment we receive the Torah, for the essence of the Torah is self-restraint" (Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, Parashat Hashavuah Shavuot 5763).

The giving of the Torah sets the stage for later practice, in which Judaism ritualizes the ebb and flow of the Jewish year by degrees of self-indulgence. The Torah is a blueprint for the ideal society and sets forth the paradigm for human living. God said, "See I give you every seed-bearing plant that is upon all the earth. [I give you] all the green plants for food." (Genesis 1:29-30, NJPS translation). The ideal way for humans to obtain their nourishment is through a vegetarian lifestyle.

But God realizes that the world is not ideal and is in need of repair. This is evident from the fact that God gives permission for humans to eat meat after he has destroyed the world with a great flood. The Torah records, "Every creature that lives shall be yours to eat… You must not, however, eat flesh with its life-blood in it" (Genesis 9:3-4). Ideally, the world we live in should be a replica of the Garden of Eden, in which a vegetarian lifestyle represented the purity and wholeness of the Heavenly Kingdom. However, after the flood, God permits us to consume meat in the realization that the world is not the Garden of Eden. The goal to re-inhabit the Garden of Eden and return to a vegetarian lifestyle remains, and thus the permission to eat meat is laden with restrictions.

In his book Halakhic Man, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik talks about the ideal religious person, and the reasoning mirrors God's thinking behind the permissibility to eat meat. "The ideal of halakhic man is the redemption of the world not via a higher world but via the world itself… If a Jew lives in accordance with the Halakhah, then he shall find redemption" (Halakhic Man, pp. 37-38). Halachah is a way for us to live our lives in this world. It infuses our existence with meaning, alleviating mourning with meaning and elevating our celebrations to a level of holiness.

Halachah enables us to celebrate life and God through Jewish living. The Mishnah Berurah discusses the consumption of meat products as a practical way to honour Shabbat: "One should make it delightful by eating large fish, heads of garlic and a dish of a beet-like plant. These foods were distinguished in their time; by the same token, people should make the day delightful by the food and drink they consider delicious… Since… most people find their main delight in meat, wine and sweets… one should lavish with meat, wine and sweets according to one's means" (Shulchan Aruch O.H. 242:1; M.B. 1-2). These comments direct us to make Shabbat special. Eating meat and drinking wine are not the only ways to do so, but they are the most common.

Our tradition's reason for indulging in these delicacies is religious and spiritual. Our rabbis referred to the time period between the 17th of Tammuz and the 9th of Av as "Bein HaMitzarim," between the straits. The world events of the last four years remind us, the Jewish community, that we are still bein hamitzarim. Meat products are the ultimate of indulgence, both in taste and in cost. Therefore, they remind us of our need to celebrate life and the goodness of God's world. This is why my wife enthusiastically accepted our friend's invitation for a fleishig lunch on Shabbat during the nine days preceding Tisha b'Av.

Opinions

Thanksgiving eyes

I rarely feel like a foreigner. As an American, I don't feel out of place in Canada. But on Thanksgiving, I get homesick. Canada has a Thanksgiving too, but it's a pretty tepid affair, basically an October rerun of Labour Day.

To Americans, Thanksgiving is serious business. The rituals are pretty banal – turkey, cranberry sauce and football – but it feels like a national holiday. It may sound corny, but most Americans see their country as a divine gift, and we celebrate that on Thanksgiving.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But you don't have to be American to understand thanksgiving. Gratitude is a moral imperative. Reciprocity is a foundations of decency: if you receive something, you are obliged to show appreciation. Gratitude is also an important character trait.

But gratitude is not only an ethical obligation, it's also a perspective on life. When we take life for granted, many things upset us. How often do we start the day annoyed that the kids/the dog/the neighbour woke us up early? And then we search for that one missing thing: the important file, the homework, the car keys. By the time we leave the house, our blood is at a full boil, and then we remember that stressful meeting at 10 o'clock. And it's only 7:30 a.m.!

When you see the world with thanksgiving eyes, none of these problems matter. Thanksgiving eyes see the world from the perspective of gratitude. They notice all the things we take for granted, like eating and friendship, and see them for what they truly are: divine blessings.

For this reason, in the morning prayers, we thank God for all the little blessings. For opening our eyes. For clothes. For the strength to sit up. For the strength to stand up. For the ability to walk. Actually, these are not little blessings, they are overlooked blessings. With thanksgiving eyes, you remember how large these "little" blessings really are. And when you can truly count your blessings, the "stressful" things in our lives melt into insignificance.

A woman I knew kept a diary while she was battling cancer. In each entry, she made sure to count her blessings, despite her difficulties. She would take note of the "little" things, like family members, fine food and a few moments of laughter. She did this until the end, remembering the blessings that she still had in her grasp even as her life was slipping away.

By looking at life from the perspective of gratitude, she made the end of her life count by focusing on the things that count the most.

Thanksgiving eyes remind us that the ordinary is actually extraordinary, and that the mundane is actually miraculous. With this outlook, every day is Thanksgiving, wherever you live.

Mahmoud Abbas has called for an end to the armed uprising. "The use of weapons is harmful and it should stop," the leading candidate for the Palestinian presidency told Ashar al-Awsat, a London-based Arabic-language newspaper. While Palestinians continue to demand Israel's destruction and while Abbas may lack the will or the skill to push his people toward accepting Israel's existence, this bold statement nevertheless challenges pro-Palestinian forces throughout the West. The time has come for the Palestinians' supporters to repudiate terrorism clearly and unequivocally.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Yasser Arafat's decision in September 2000 to lead his people away from the Oslo negotiations and back toward terror launched a two-pronged assault against Israel. As suicide bombers targeted restaurants, buses and seders throughout Israel, an intellectual intifadah assailed Israel's legitimacy throughout the world. The United Nations continued its decades-long obsession with the Jewish state, while journalists, professors and European politicians demonized Israel, ignoring its concessions during the Oslo peace process and escalating from criticizing Israeli policies and prime ministers to questioning Zionism itself.

Ironically, while most Jews and Israelis had stopped questioning Palestinian nationalism, Palestinian supporters repudiated Jewish nationalism. Led by Arafat, who pooh-poohed Jews' 3,000-year relationship with Jerusalem and the Holy Temple, many critics dismissed the 56-year-old manifestations of that historic nationalism, the State of Israel. Without applying similar criteria to artificial countries such as Pakistan, or even Iraq, critics singled out Israel's founding as illegitimate.

Along with this obsessive opprobrium toward Israel came an amoral myopia vis-a-vis the Palestinians. Cast as the victims in a conflict they initiated and could stop at any time, somehow Palestinians could do no wrong. A rationale of "by all means necessary" justified mass murder. Protesters in April 2002 deemed suicide bombers "Martyrs not Murderers." People who profess to love peace overlooked the militarization of Palestinian culture and the spread of the cult of suicide bombing – just as feminists overlooked Palestinian sexism, gay right activists overlooked the homophobia, and liberals ignored the many abuses during Arafat's dictatorship.

In such a searing conflict, awash with moral dilemmas and painful choices, no side is perfect. But part of the asymmetrical warfare of the past four years had to do with the disproportionate criticism heaped on only one combatant. Many Israelis certainly internalized the criticism, and some of the most vicious critics of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his policies have been Israeli journalists and academics. As Natan Sharansky notes in his magnificent book The Case for Democracy, a similar culture of dissent, of course, could not flourish among Palestinians, given the absence of freedom in Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

Over the summer, after thousands of casualties on both sides, a conventional wisdom about Arafat evolved – at least in North America. U.S. President George W. Bush had already soured on Arafat in January 2002, when the Palestinian president lied about the massive Karine A arms shipment from Iran. Back then, Bush's stance invited yet more mockery from sophisticates.

And while too many European leaders remained Arafat devotees until – and even after – his death, journalists began tracking the billions he stole from well-meaning countries who wished to alleviate his people's misery. Editorialists began doubting the wisdom of Arafat's tactics, as well as the sincerity of his occasional expressions of regret for suicide bombing. The faint breezes of optimism wafting through the Middle East after his death – and the bold statements of his presumptive heir – highlight just how destructive Arafat was.

Of course, it is too much to expect academics or journalists to admit they were wrong for enabling Arafatism. But is it too much to ask that now, when Palestinian culture is debating the efficacy of violence, when public opinion polls hint that doubt is growing around the culture of martyrdom, that Palestinian supporters weigh in?

For years now, Peace Now forces in Israel have said, "We support Israel, but we don't support the settlements or the occupation or Ariel Sharon." Isn't it time for pro-Palestinian forces – who did so much to encourage this recent violence by emboldening Arafat and his jihadists – to support Palestinians, democracy and peace. Apologies are useless and not likely. The best form of penance would be helping to solve the problem and reform the PA, rather than facilitating Palestinian delusions and violence.

My grandfather's names

My grandfather, Israel Horowitz, was not always named Horowitz. In Poland, he was called Yisroel Schraga Zachorevitch. By shortening the family name to the more pronounceable Horowitz, my grandfather lost the first two syllables – "zachor" – or "memory" in Hebrew. In a manner of speaking, this was the price one was asked to pay for entry into the New World almost a century ago: Jewish memory.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

What is a Jew without memory? My grandfather's name change suggests the dissolving of religious practice to fit into mainstream North American life. But my grandfather did not lose his memory. Like some Jewish immigrants of his generation, my grandfather struggled to meld an American life with Jewish practice and learning. In my earliest memory of him, I sit on his lap and run my tiny finger along his bushy moustache as he playfully tries to bite me. When I was old enough to start school, my grandfather would seat me on his lap and ask me to read to him aloud from a chumash. Reading chumash to Grandpa was a rite of passage for my many boy cousins. But I was the first of his granddaughters to be formally educated Judaically, and this created a special bond between us.

I found myself thinking of my grandfather as I spent the better part of a week hunkering down in Chicago in subfreezing temperatures. Together with almost 900 professors of Jewish studies from North America, Israel, and elsewhere, my York University colleagues and I head each December to the annual conference of the Association for Jewish Studies to share the results of research and scholarship on a wide array of topics. New knowledge is presented, along with new questions and new interpretations. The fields of research range from history to literature to Israel studies to Bible to rabbinics to mysticism to gender studies to social sciences – the list goes on.

It is from these 900 or so people that university-age students will be most likely to learn about Jewish texts and the Jewish experience if they take courses in Jewish studies at the university level. With all the choices available, why should they take courses in Jewish studies? For Jewish students who have not received intense Jewish education before entering university, Jewish studies courses acquaint them with the fundamental, foundational texts of Judaism, and offer students a way to place themselves in relation to these texts and to contextualize their own lives in relation to the Jewish past and the Jewish present. For non-Jewish students, the courses help them break down some of the myths and stereotypes about Jews, and come to a greater understanding of a minority culture and its values.

Students who have been educated Jewishly may be tempted to think that Jewish studies courses at the university level are superfluous for them. I have great sympathy with their desire to strike out and take courses in areas they may not have encountered before. After all, the world is vast, and universities provide the means to stimulate and satisfy cultural and intellectual curiosity.

But there are good reasons for even day school graduates to study Jewish texts, culture and history in university – and no, it's not because their prior learning will yield them a high grade with minimal effort. There is no guarantee of that – students with strong backgrounds in Jewish education are often surprised at the challenge presented by Jewish studies courses.

Jewish studies courses give students a means to think about Judaism, Jewish identity, experience and culture with the intellect of an adult. Students find that at university, subjects they have encountered before – such as literature, history, chemistry, or math – are brought to a new level. The same is true of approaches to Jewish studies. While the Judaism of their childhood may forge strong and important emotional connections, it may not be sufficient to withstand the intellectual and existential questions of adulthood.

Such courses did not exist, of course, when my grandfather arrived on the shores of the New World, nor when my father went to university. Sitting in a Chicago symposium, I think about my grandfather's middle name, Schraga, which means "candle" in Yiddish. It calls up associations with Shabbat candles, with the yahrzeit candle by which my grandfather is now remembered, and with the illumination of knowledge, and of the soul.

White Rose's Wittenstein fought Nazis

"Somebody had to do it, and that sums it up," said Jurgen (George) Wittenstein, one of the last surviving members of White Rose, the German anti-Nazi student group whose feats of passive resistance have become the stuff of legend in contemporary Germany.

White Rose, which distributed leaflets denouncing Nazi tyranny and the murder of Jews, was never more than a minor irritant in the throat of Nazi Germany. "Historically, we achieved nothing," observed Wittenstein, who was a member of White Rose's inner circle. "It was doomed, like all the groups attempting to overthrow the regime. Only the army could have done that."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But White Rose, which has been celebrated by a succession of books, films, plays and an opera since its destruction in 1943, was a powerful symbol of unwavering opposition to homegrown evil. "What it hopefully achieved was that it taught students the necessity of standing up for their convictions, regardless of the consequences," said Wittenstein in a telephone interview from his home in Santa Barbara, Calif.

The distinguished American historian, Fritz Stern, who fled Germany in the 1930s, recently put that issue in perspective. "We who witnessed the rise of National Socialism were left with the all-consuming complex question: How was it possible for this horror to seize the nation and corrupt so much of Europe? We should remember, however, that even in the darkest period, there were individuals who showed acts of decency [and] defied intimidation and repression…"

Wittenstein, now 85 and ailing, was one of these courageous Germans. A physician, he was a medical student at the University of Munich when White Rose existed.

In several respects, Wittenstein was one of its pivotal figures. He introduced two of its leading lights, Hans Scholl and Alexander Schmorell, to each other, and knew the other key conspirators, Sophie Scholl, Christoph Probst and Willi Graf. He snapped the iconic photograph of Hans and his sister, Sophie. He edited two of its six leaflets, the third and the fourth. He carried a batch of leaflets to Berlin. He consoled the parents of Hans and Sophie after their arrest. He raised funds for the widow of Kurt Huber, the professor who wrote the final two leaflets.

Wittenstein, who was to have come to Toronto recently to attend Judy Kopelow's production of the opera White Rose but could not due to ill health, was born in 1919 in the southern German town of Tubingen. The scion of an anti-Nazi family, Wittenstein clearly defined himself as an opponent of the new Germany when, in 1934, he refused to join the Hitler Youth. His views hardened as he witnessed the indignities to which his Jewish friends were subjected and as he travelled around Europe and realized that Germany was descending into totalitarianism.

Drafted into the army in 1938, he was an eyewitness to Germany's annexation of Austria and part of Czechoslovakia. He enrolled at the University of Munich about a year later, and on the eve of Germany's invasion of Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, he decided to leave Germany for good. Thoroughly fed up with the regime, he bought passage on a ship bound for the United States. But on the third day out at sea, the war broke out and the vessel, filled mainly with German Jewish refugees, was ordered to return to the port of Hamburg.

Back in Munich, Wittenstein resumed contact with his circle of close friends, who tended to be devout Christians, shared his interests in the arts, music, philosophy and the outdoors and were generally disgusted by the principles and practices of Nazism. Most of them had Jewish friends and knew perfectly well what the Nazis were doing to Jews.

In 1940, Wittenstein was drafted yet again, housed in military barracks and required to attend classes in uniform. As Germany lurched into further barbarity, forcing Jews to wear the Yellow Star and deporting them to destinations in eastern Europe, he and like-minded friends resolved to act on their fervent beliefs. But most Germans, proud of the Wehrmacht's blitzkrieg, were swept up by an unstoppable tide of patriotism and an overwhelming feeling that Germany should rule Europe, he said.

During the summer of 1942, Alexander Schmorell and Hans Scholl wrote four leaflets that bore the title of "Leaves of the White Rose." Two more leaflets were produced in the following year. They were dropped in phone booths and mailed to students and professors in Munich – a major centre of the Nazi movement – and taken by couriers to various universities in Germany for distribution.

Drawing on quotations from the Bible, Aristotle, Goethe and Schiller, the leaflets basically carried the same message.

The first leaflet chided Germans for allowing themselves to be governed by "an irresponsible clique that has yielded to base instinct" and committed "the most horrible of crimes." The second leaflet described the bestial murder of Jews in Poland as "a crime … unparalleled in the whole of history" and lambasted the annihilation of the Polish aristocracy. "Why do German people behave so apathetically in the face of these abominable crimes? The German people slumber on in their dull, stupid sleep and encourage these fascist criminals." It urged all Germans "to destroy these beasts."

Hans and Sophie Scholl in 1942

The third leaflet cried out, "We must soon bring this monster of a state to an end," and declared that the "first order of business" was Germany's unconditional defeat. The fourth leaflet branded the Nazis as anti-Christs, stated that White Rose was not in the pay of any foreign power and concluded, "We are your bad conscience. The White Rose will not leave you in peace!"

The fifth leaflet, titled "A Call To All Germans," warned that Hitler was leading the country "into the abyss," condemned Prussian militarism and called for freedom of religion and speech in a renewed Germany within a federated Europe. The sixth leaflet, coming on the heels of Germany's catastrophic defeat at the Battle of Stalingrad, asserted, "The name of Germany is dishonoured for all time if German youth does not finally rise, take revenge, atone and smash its tormentors."

A seventh leaflet, which was not distributed, referred to the "torture" of Jews and the eradication of Poles and stated, "Hitler and his regime must fall so that Germany can live."

By that point, Hans and Sophie already had been arrested after having deposited their leaflets at the University of Munich, and Wittenstein's abhorrence of National Socialism had been burned deeply into his soul.

In the summer of 1942, a year after Germany had lunged into the Soviet Union, Wittenstein was shipped to the Russian front as a medic. En route, he spent a few days in Warsaw, where Jews had been pressed into a ghetto. He could only get as far as the ghetto's gates, guarded by Ukrainians in German uniforms, but the sight was revolting.

"I was horrified to discover that, for a pack of cigarettes, these Ukrainians would shoot for pleasure to whom one pointed. I saw SS officers horse-whipping and kicking many Jews without provocation, and managed to take pictures of that."

In the Soviet Union, he heard shooting after trucks off-loaded prisoners in a forest. "I assumed they were Jews or Russians." Wittenstein tried to investigate, but was driven back by guards.

Hans and Sophie, after a sham trial in February 1943, were executed by guillotine. Their associates were beheaded soon afterward.

The Gestapo, suspecting Wittenstein as a fellow traveller, interrogated him and turned over his dossier to a court martial court. Wittenstein's commander protected him, praising him as a good soldier and an upstanding German. When Wittenstein subsequently learned that the Gestapo had accumulated incriminating evidence against him, he requested a transfer to the front lines. "One did not usually volunteer for the front," he explained, "but the Gestapo had no jurisdiction over soldiers on the front." Although he eluded the Gestapo, he was wounded on the Italian front, a relatively small price to pay considering the alternatives.

With the war over, he continued his studies as a cardiovascular specialist in the United States. He and his wife, Christl, an ethnic German from Poland and a physician as well, settled in Santa Barbara in 1960 and had four children. He was a private practitioner and performed and taught surgery at the University of California's medical centre until his retirement.

These days, Wittenstein suffers from a severe back ailment that leaves him in pain, but the memory of the dear friends he lost in Nazi Germany is probably just as painful.

passed away suddenly after a brief illness, on December 12th 2004. Jean was born in Opatow, Poland in 1918. She is predeceased by Sam Nerenberg, her loving husband of 57 years who died this year on April 10.

Jean survived the horrors of the Holocaust where most of her large family perished.

After the war Jean re-met and married Sam Nerenberg of Staszow, Poland. and moved to Belgium where their son David was born. The family left Belgium in 1949 and eventually settled in Toronto, Canada in 1955. There, Sam and Jean built a successful home building business. In 2001, Sam and Jean moved to Dallas where their son, David Nerenberg and his family, had settled in 1978.

Although diminutive, Jean was a woman with an enormous heart, always putting the needs of others first. She is remembered by all who knew her as a woman of tremendous dignity, and fierce intelligence and intuition, with a deep devotion to her family and the memory of those she lost in the Holocaust. Her greatest pride and deepest joy was in caring for her family- with her incredible cooking and warm, embracing love. She is survived by her adored son David, daughter-in-law Linda, grandchildren Jeremy, Marly and Rory, great-grandson Julian and many nieces and nephews. From the ashes of the Holocaust, a daily and painful reminder in her life, Jean Nerenberg left a legacy of love, dignity and integrity.

Don't be ashamed to be old-fashioned

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

As a child growing up in New York City, I remember the kind of excitement that this time of year held – the excitement of things predictable. It was a near-sure thing that on the day of the American Thanksgiving, the winter's first snow would fall, and it was a sure thing that we would miss one or two days of school because of the snow. And it was a sure thing that we'd get our winter break, celebrate Chanukah, and maybe go away on holiday. In short, this time of year was one that was filled with joy and celebration, and the world – at least my small world – was a little bit better.

This time of year makes people dust off Zaide's latke recipe, sing old songs and embrace traditional habits. In short, while for some the word may sting a bit, at this time of year, we all become "old-fashioned." The knowledge that others have done the same thing before us gives us comfort and warmth. It gives greater meaning to what we do.

The idea of being old-fashioned is connected to this week's Torah portion of Va'era. In it, we read of the first steps that our great teacher and leader Moshe takes to engage with his future. God helps Moshe by telling him that he is not the first to receive the Divine, that he is not the first to be called to a mission, and that he is following in the footsteps of the giants who came before him. God says: "...and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, as God Almighty." (Shmot 6:3)

The commentary Divrei Meir suggests that the reason God gives this spiritual history is to remind us that these great men recognized God, that the precedent for belief and faith had been established, and that to find the meaningful and good, Moshe first needed to look back before he moved forward. In short, it is the old that gives confidence to the new.

Along those lines, I want to thank all parents – living or not – who taught us what it means to be old-fashioned. I'm referring to those parents who, when it came to dress, didn't say "Wear whatever you want," because they certainly didn't think clothes that showed more and covered less made us look more beautiful. They didn't wash our mouths out with soap, but they certainly taught us to watch what we say. They also taught us to enjoy sports, but to always play fairly – whether as a player or a spectator. (Today, most professional athletes complain about their lives – the attention, the demands – and some even complain about the punishments they get when they step over the line and forget the good fortune and responsibility they have.)

And many children of previous generations knew that there was no escaping punishment when they heard the words, "Wait until your father gets home."

Even if these fashions are old, should they be out of style?

I know that some look to the new before the old, and I know that some pursue the new at the expense of the old, and I know that we live in a time when the new promises things that the old never could. But I also know that many of the promises the new makes are never quite as true as they should be, and I also know that the old never falls short of what we know it to be.

So, at this time of year, feel free to take pride in being "old-fashioned."

Buenos Aires Jews host first Holocaust conference in Latin America

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG

Guest Voice

"Don't cry for me, Argentina" goes the famous line in the most memorable song of the hit musical Evita. But there is reason to be sad about Argentina, the country, and perhaps even more so about the struggling Jewish yishuv that is now a pale reflection of the vibrant, 450,000 strong community that existed a scant two generations ago.

Although poverty is visible in dilapidated buildings, roads and sidewalks that need repair, and the many panhandlers, the city is recovering: the shops and outdoor markets are busy, the movie houses and restaurants are full, and tango and soccer still rule the streets.

However, when I spoke to a charismatic young rebbi after Sabbath services at a lovely synagogue in the largely Jewish "Once" district, he confided to me that he provided lunch to about 100 people every weekday.

Still, the community is gamely battling to regain its economic and social balance.

I had an opportunity to experience this phenomenon recently when invited to participate in the community's first Holocaust conference, titled – appropriately – "De Cara al Futuro" ("Facing the Future"). It was an impressive effort, organized by Diana Wang, president of Generaciones de la Shoa en Argentina, and Graziela Jinich, executive director of the Holocaust Museum in Buenos Aries. These two institutions and the Fundacion Memoria del Holocausto were the chief sponsors of the conference, which also received support from AMIA, the city, the provincial and federal governments, and a host of private and public endowments and individuals.

I had the privilege of being the first of two speakers who set the themes of the conference at the opening ceremony attended by almost 1,500 people in the cavernous auditorium of the Gen. San Martin Cultural Centre. What made my appearance unusual was that I spoke in Yiddish. A translation of my lecture – which I had e-mailed in transliteration – was then read in Spanish by Eliahu Toker, a well-known Argentinian writer fluent in Yiddish.

I was thus the beneficiary of two rounds of applause, as more than half of the huge audience applauded my Yiddish speech and then again applauded Toker's translation. As well, although there were graduate students and other Spanish-speaking delegates from the United States, I was the only speaker from North America.

Subsequently I was invited to an interview on their full-time radio station, "Radio CHAI" (they pronounce it as "Jai"), which reaches all Latin America. Again I spoke in Yiddish, with a translator rendering my work in Spanish. Not a "Jewish Hour," but a 24-hour radio station. That is worthy of admiration!

The conference featured four full days of panel discussions, exhibitions, films and live performances. Although a "cri de coeur" both for the horrors of the Holocaust and for the loss of more than 3,000 young Jewish lives during the "dirty war" conducted by the generals in Argentina in the late 1970s, as well as the bombing of the Israeli Embassy in 1992 and of AMIA in 1994, the conference was also a celebration of Jewish life in Argentina.

As one U.S. participant said, it was "an event that inspired courage to face the future, healing of deep wounds and new friendship."

The Jewish community in Argentina still needs assistance. However, "De Cara Al Futuro" demonstrated that there can be hope for Argentina's Jews. And a radio station beaming 24 hours of live Jewish programming – that is something we can envy.

Sound advice from a lowly bush

The Torah readings for this time of year bring us into the land of Egypt, where we we find the Jewish people at first thriving and then suffering.

The transition into Egypt is a smooth one. Jacob and his entire family come down at the end of the book of Genesis because there is a famine in Canaan. While living in Egypt, Joseph, the second-in-command, is sustaining his family and they are well cared for and beginning to thrive.

After Jacob dies, Pharaoh grants permission to return him for burial to Canaan, but Joseph must then come back to Egypt. Thus, the patriarch, Jacob, returns to the land promised by God, but all his descendants remain in Egypt. Until the moment of his own death, Joseph continues to sustain his family, and they are well cared for within Egypt. Before Joseph dies, he makes his brothers swear that they will return his body to the land of Israel when they themselves return. The book of Genesis ends with the uncertainty of the return.

When the book of Exodus begins, we are quickly told that the wonderful circumstances of Joseph's time are changing. Egyptian leaders do not remember Joseph's connection to the Israelites and the thriving numbers of the Jewish people are now of great concern to Pharaoh. Slavery becomes the ultimate solution to the problem.

The story as it continues – Moses' birth, adoption and subsequent escape from Egypt – contains narratives familiar to us from Torah and from Passover. Ultimately, Moses finds himself standing on a mountain facing a burning bush and encountering God. We are struck by the unique fire that continues to burn even though the bush is not being consumed.

However, the Midrash is not only fascinated by the fire, it is also fascinated by the bush.

Several midrashim identify the specific bush in question as a thornbush. In some of the explanations offered, the thornbush is deemed most appropriate as it is a modest, shunned bush. No one would cultivate one within their garden and no one values the thorns produced by the bush. Is it not, therefore, most fitting that God would be present even within those parts of creation that are most detested and shunned?

Another explanation likens the bush to Israel and the fire to Egypt. Just as the fire cannot consume the bush, so Egypt will be unable to consume Israel. The anomalous image now becomes one of endurance, hope and determination.

Yet another explanation centres on the distinct way you would be ensnared by a thornbush. The thorns are such that when you put your hand into the bush, the thorns are smooth and your hand is softly welcomed into the midst of the thorns. It is only when you try to take your hand out that the thorns catch on your skin and your hand becomes painfully caught.

As God is speaking with Moses on a mountain, the bush continues to burn with the unique fire. The mission God is giving Moses – the liberation of the Jewish people from Egypt – is only part of the ongoing message. The bush and the fire continue to burn beyond the divine words. As we encounter new circumstances in the world, we must not only ask ourselves if we can see our way into them, but we must also question if we can see our way out again.

Comics: the readers write

Boy, did I hit a nerve!

I recently wrote a couple of columns about Jewish comic-book creators and on Jewish superheroes. I thought I did a pretty comprehensive job. I mean, how many people and characters could there be? Well, let's just say quite a few more than I had mentioned originally – and you let me know, loud and clear. So, here's the final word on Jewish comics and superheroes – for now, at least.

Avi Romberg: "I was reading the article you just sent – I used to be a bit of a comic-book fan – and I noticed that you missed a somewhat recent revelation of a major comic-book character's Jewish roots. That's right, The Thing from the Fantastic Four is indeed Jewish!" Although it seems creator Jack Kirby (born Jacob Kurtzburg) intended The Thing to be Jewish, his roots weren't revealed until 2002. In the issue Remembrance of Things Past, the Thing (aka Benjamin Jacob "Ben" Grimm) is asked why he never mentioned his religion before. Is he ashamed of being Jewish? "Nah, that ain't it," replies The Thing. "Anyone on the Internet can find out, if they want. It's just... I don't talk it up, is all. Figure there's enough trouble in this world without people thinkin' Jews are all monsters like me." [www.forward.com/issues/2002/02.07.26/fast1.html]

Alan Orlich: "I'm afraid that you may be mistaken in describing Matzoh Girl as the first superheroine with matzoh powers. As you'll see from this link, Matzah Woman (formerly Hypergirl) appeared in the Jewish Hero Corps CD-Comic in the autumn of 1996."

I took a look at Orlich's work and was particularly amused by the rest of his menagerie and their Jewish superpowers:

• Minyan Man: the Decimal Daredevil can multiply into 10.
• Dreidel Maidel: the Hurricane Heroine can spin at tremendous speed.
• Yarmulkah Youth: the Capped Crusader has a belt full of trick yarmulkes. [www.jewishsuperhero.com/]

Dave Ben-Yshay wants you and me to know about his creation, Shkoyach, a comic strip featuring "the agnostic, temperamental and obnoxious Shrimp and Dave, a single, mild-mannered Orthodox Jew living in Brooklyn, N.Y." Figuring that the safest place for a crustacean to live is with an Orthodox Jew, "Shrimp moves in with Dave and a social conflict sparks between them." The droll duo examines everything from overindulging at kiddushes to what life would be like if Jews lived in the "Matrix." Don't worry if the references get a bit obscure. Footnotes are supplied. [www.shkoyach.com/]

Ofer Zanzuri wrote from Israel to tell me about his comic book Adiri Hatchelet. Something goes wrong at a nuclear plant, which has a profound effect on six individuals who gain different superpowers. We are kept guessing as to how they will react to these changes and whether they will use their new powers for good. There's quite a bit more at the Hebrew-language site, including excerpts from each issue of the comic. [www.zanzuria.com/comix.html]

Tolsa Greenberg: "My son-in-law Saul Colt is fascinated with comics and now writes his own comic books and sells them on the 'net, too. Check it out at [www.ssscomics.com]. It's a great site ... needless to say, [I'm] a prejudiced Jewish mother-in-law." Who am I to disagree?

Finally, here's one more link about a different kind of hero that I wanted to tell you about. Last summer, windsurfer Gal Fridman made headlines when he became the first Israeli to win gold at the Olympics. Olympic team manager Gilad Lustig echoed the thoughts of Jews everywhere when he told Reuters, "Gal Fridman is our greatest athlete. To see our flag displayed and hear our national anthem played at the awards ceremony is a moment we have long been waiting for." [http://tinyurl.com/3psas] You don't have to wait to relive that incredible moment. The entire awards ceremony with a proud – and emotional – Fridman can be found online, accompanied by the sound of cheering from an enthusiastic crowd [http://tinyurl.com/6zgca]

The saga of Sam Bassin and his mother Surah Liebe

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Feature

My father, Sam Bassin, came to Canada in 1908 from Balinitz, a czarist Russian stetl close to the Polish border. Central to his precipitate exit and subsequently party to a brief but astonishing courtroom scene was his mother Surah Liebe.

Totally illiterate, this diminutive woman nevertheless had an agile mind. When a notice arrived ordering her son to report for military duty, she sprang into action. Her husband Avrum was a tailor and she often worked with him. Gathering some basic clothing and a few other necessities for her son, she bundled him into a cart stashed in a lean-to adjoining their log house, and covered him with a recently finished suit that was ready for delivery, as well as a substantial overcoat that hung over the sides of the cart. Then, deliberately, in broad daylight, she set out quite openly and pushed the cart through town.

Surah Liebe always had a small cache of savings for emergencies and this was an emergency. Sam, a tailor like his father, had been setting aside some earnings for years, hoping to emigrate.

It was not unusual for young men to try and evade the draft, particularly Jews, who could be kept away from home for 20 to 25 years in officialdom's hope that they would eventually cease to be Jews altogether. Some never returned.

There are grim stories, too, of would-be evaders puncturing an eardrum, maiming an eye or having a toe amputated.

Surah Liebe, determined to keep her son whole, plodded on foot toward the border, where smugglers would spirit him across to Poland. Sam produced enough money for a railway ticket to take him through Europe. Surah Liebe achingly wondered if she would ever see her son again, but encouraged him to go.

Somewhere en route, Sam met Moishe Grafstein, a Polish Jew from Radom, who was also Canada bound. The two became friends, and in Bristol, they shared a cramped room, waiting for a ship to take them over the Atlantic to Halifax.

Even in those early years, Jewish immigrants were met by members of a Jewish organization offering help when the newcomers were about to travel by train to Montreal or Toronto.

Asked if he had any money, Moishe grandly and proudly declared, "Of course." This was not true.

Sam said that he had "a few kopeks" left and was handed a tin of salmon, a loaf of bread and some water. He shared the food with Moishe. In Toronto, they parted, each going his own way.

Sam walked up Elizabeth Street clutching a scrap of paper with the address of his brother and sister-in-law, Shloime and Soshe, who had come to Canada earlier. One or two people directed him. The next day, he was hired as a tailor in the shop operated by the T. Eaton Company. Language was no problem because most of the employees spoke Yiddish.

Back in Balinitz, Avrum and Surah Liebe were summoned to court to explain their son's absence. They went together, but Surah Liebe, knowing that her gentle, quiet husband was virtually unable to speak in public, approached the judge herself and stood very straight before him.

Looking at the little woman in her babushka and high topped boots, he demanded, "Where is your son?"

"I don't know," she replied.

"What do you mean, you don't know? Don't you realize that he is the czar's son?"

"Well, if he is the czar's son," she responded indignantly, "let the czar find him!"

She could have been severely punished, perhaps banished to Siberia, but something in the feisty lady's demeanour obviously elicited a grudging admiration. The judge fined her a pittance and said, "Go home."

Sam's adult sisters came to Toronto legally, and together the brothers and sisters later brought their parents and the younger children, a total of 11, including Avrum and Surah Liebe.

Sam married Moishe Grafstein's niece Fannie, and these were my father and mother.

My Bubbie Surah Liebe, indomitable to the end, stubbornly spoke only Yiddish to me and I am grateful for that. One of our daughters is named for her.

"They shouldn't have done that because for an allergic reaction, they should keep us there for four to six hours," Lisa says.

"On the way home, [Jaimie] started having problems breathing and it became a full anaphylactic reaction. I had my child in the back seat screaming, 'Mommy, give me the EpiPen, I can't breathe.'"

By the time Jaimie returned to the hospital and was given the appropriate treatment, she was in a severe state.

"Her oxygen saturation levels had dropped to about 70 and they should be at 98 or 99. Her hands and feet were blue and she was freezing cold," Lisa laments. "She ended up with hair loss from the shock to her system."

Lisa and Allan decided to send Jaimie to Ohr Menachem, a private Jewish day school, after a public school principal told the couple there were simply too many risk factors in a public school setting. At Ohr Menachem, Jaimie is in a small, friendly class. Posters that display Jaimie's picture, as well as a list of her allergies, symptoms and emergency contact information are located throughout the school.

The talented artist is well-informed about her condition and how to avoid dangerous foods.

"She's always been incredibly responsible and generally won't touch anything unless we say the ingredients are OK" Allan says. "As she gets older, she's coming to realize that she is different… and can't do the same things that everyone else can."

Jaimie suffers from social anxiety, which the Nackans attribute in part to her condition.

"I think she's angry at the fact she's got these allergies," says Lisa, noting that Jaimie once lay in bed unable to sleep because she was frustrated about not being like the other kids.

Lisa and Allan see the book Jaimie is writing as a potentially empowering project for her.

"I want Jaimie to get satisfaction and feel empowered by taking her allergies and doing something positive with it by educating people." Lisa says. "That's what she wants."

The family hopes the book will become an educational tool, but Lisa says she's not trying to make money from it, and if there are any proceeds, they will go directly to Anaphylaxis Canada. For more information about the condition, visit www.anaphylaxis.org.

Engstrom taught for three decades at CHAT

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Douglas Engstrom, probably the longest-serving teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, died at Princess Margaret Hospital on Dec. 13 following a lengthy illness.

Obituary

He had been on extended sick leave since the summer of 2000, following a diagnosis of prostate cancer about a year earlier. Engstrom taught at CHAT for 30 years, and also taught part-time at Yeshivat Or Chaim.

"Throughout his career, Doug Engstrom demonstrated an extraordinary charisma," said Paul Shaviv, CHAT's director of education. "The many tributes that have flowed into the school since his passing – not a few from former students who were themselves inspired to become teachers by him – testify to the range and excitement of his teaching. He was a man of great intellectual curiosity."

A tribute from CHAT alumnus Harold Bergstein, now living in Jerusalem, recalled the Akron, Ohio, native as an "intellectual jack of all trades" who taught him science, Latin, geography, and urban geography. Engstrom also taught civics, world issues and economics.

Eric Grossman, a 1989 graduate, remembered Engstrom, who was not Jewish, reprimanding – in Hebrew – two students who were gossiping behind his back in Hebrew, provoking a "stunned silence." Apparently Engstrom had taught himself the language.

Tribute after tribute recalled his eccentric personality, enthusiasm for teaching, and tales of hunting and flying exploits.

A memorial fund has been established at the school in his name.

Engstrom is survived by his wife Barbara and two daughters, Aurelia and Madeleine.

WORD POWER: The Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School recently held its annual public speaking contest, in which first-, second- and third-place winners were chosen for grades 6, 7 and 8. Pictured, back row from left, are Julie-Ray King (third place, Grade 8); Daniel Goldberg (third place, Grade 7); Justin Joseph Herzig Cuperfain (second place, Grade 7); and Zachary Benatar (second place, Grade 8). Front row, from left, are Ave Bross (first place, Grade 6), Hayley Lipworth (second place, Grade 6), and Adam Deverett (third place, Grade 6). Not pictured are Samantha Landy (first place, Grade 7) and Joshua Cymbalista (first place, Grade 8).

Canadian kids raise funds for Shaare Zedek

The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, together with students from Hebrew day schools across Toronto, is launching Rainbows of Hope and Healing, a new fundraising and awareness program designed to educate students about Shaare Zedek Medical Center and help them make a difference in Israel.

The program involves kids in making special beaded crystal bracelets, which the foundation then sells for $20 each, with all profits going directly to purchase lifesaving medical equipment for Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

Said one boy about the project: "Being a kid, this is something I can actually do to help save lives in Israel – and it's fun!"

The students work together as a class, grade or school to bead and sell the unique rainbow bracelets, which are hand-crafted from Swarovski crystals and have a sterling silver charm.

School sessions include one hour of bracelet crafting, with all materials provided. Each class, grade or school that meets its fundraising goal – for example, $2,000 for a resuscitation cart – will be treated to a special "thank you" party.

To get your school or synagogue involved with the Rainbows of Hope and Healing program, contact Rebecca Kauffman at 416-781-3584.

Indoor grill is great for more than burgers

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

The indoor grill is like the new microwave, says Ilana Simon, food columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press. "It seems like everyone has them, but they're not sure how to use them."

The indoor barbecue isn't just for the occasional steak anymore, and Simon hopes to teach everyone to master the grill.

Simon released her third cookbook, 125 Best Indoor Grill Recipes (Robert Rose), this fall, geared to the culinarily challenged, busy parents and lazy teens. In it, she dishes out the details on how to use the plug-in barbecue to make full meals like cayenne raspberry chicken, herbed halibut and grilled fruit kabobs. She proves that foods other than hamburgers can be grilled to perfection.

"I think people look at the grill and think, 'Oh it's great for burgers,'" she says from her home in Winnipeg. "They don't think of all the different things you can do with it and how versatile it is. I love preparing fish on the indoor grill. It's also great for sandwiches. You can also use it for part of a dish. Maybe grill a steak and add it to the beef noodle salad. You can even do desserts on it."

Simon's love affair with the grill didn't start with this book, though. She's been using it for years and enjoyed the culinary discoveries that came with a new appliance.

"I had been grilling for a number of years, and done some different things, but I really got into coming up with new ideas. I enjoyed discovering the different ways you can use it. I found myself making breaded pickerel, black and red fish, and it's great because it doesn't make the whole house smell like fish."

In addition to minimizing fishy odours, Simon says, one great thing about using the grill is that it makes for healthy eating.

"It's great for low fat fare, because all the fat drips off of the grill pan," she says. "It's also really good for people following higher protein-centered diets cause you can use lean cuts of beef and boneless skinless chicken breasts and you can prepare it minus the fat while keeping the flavour."

In her book, Simon even includes a recipe for low fat latkes that doesn't call for nearly as much oil as cooking them in a frying pan.

Although low fat foods and variety are good reasons to try grilling, the best incentive to plug in is for efficiency.

"In this day and age when many families have two working parents, people are always looking for easy and quick recipes," says the mother of two. "The grill is great because it allows you to do that and healthfully. In the time it takes to order a pizza, you can do something on the grill. It's fast, easy to clean up and really tasty."

Simon adds that all her recipes take about 15 minutes to grill and many of the foods take about 15 minutes to prepare.

Creating a cookbook with 125 meals isn't a simple task. All of Simon's recipes are original and took her about nine months to compile. Fortunately, her family were happy to test her creations.

"My family were my guinea pigs. Which is great because it's really important to have

EAT YOUR POMELITS: Researchers at Hebrew University suggest that regular consumption of an Israeli fruit called a pomelit – a cross between and pomelo and a grapefruit– may help prevent heart attacks and blocked arteries. The researchers tested 72 patients, aged 43 to 71, at Kaplan Hospital in Rehovot who had elevated cholesterol levels and had undergone bypass surgery. After 30 days, the two out of three test groups who drank the juice exhibited reduced LDL ("bad") blood cholesterol levels and increased blood antioxidant activity, as opposed to those who did not. The patients who consumed the highest daily amount of juice showed a significant increase in blood albumin and decrease in blood fibrinogen levels, which enhance anti-coagulant activity. Holding some pomelits are Hebrew U researcher Dr. Shela Gorinstein and Dr. Abraham Caspi, head of the cardiovascular institute at Kaplan Hospital. [IPS photo courtesy of Hebrew University]

other people's opinions and they're always honest."

With so many grills on the market, figuring out which one is the best can be a daunting task. Fortunately for her readers, Simon's tried almost all of them.

"I tried out several indoor grills. The ones I really recommend are the two-sided or contact grills. Heat comes from both sides and it's very quick."

For those unfamiliar with the indoor grill, it's basically equivalent to an outdoor barbecue. Simon says all the same foods you would prepare on the barbecue can be done on the grill.

"You can do most of the same things on the barbecue that you can do on the indoor grill," she says. "It works best with boneless, skinless cuts of chicken. Beef also works well, and salmon filets are just fantastic. It's really easy to use for someone who's never barbecued before."

So summertime favourites like barbecued chicken, pepper steak and seasoned beef burgers can now be done indoors, during any season.

"I think as the weather gets colder people are more inclined to pull out their grills. It's easy to have a lot of fun with it."

BBQ CHICKEN

2 tbsp. ketchup
2 tbsp. prepared kosher chili sauce
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 tsp. packed brown sugar
1 tsp. dried onion flakes
1 tsp. curry powder
½ tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. garlic powder
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts

In a small bowl, whisk together ketchup, chili sauce, vinegar, brown sugar, onion flakes, curry powder, salt, garlic powder and pepper. Place chicken breasts in a shallow dish. Brush marinade on chicken, coating evenly. Cover and refrigerate for a minimum of 20 minutes or up to 1 hour. Meanwhile, preheat contact grill. Spray both sides of grill with vegetable cooking spray or oil. Place chicken on grill, close lid and grill for 5 to 6 minutes, or until chicken is no longer pink inside and reaches an internal temperature of 170° F.

HERBED HALIBUT

2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil (or 2 tsp. dried)
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 tbsp. chopped fresh oregano (or 1 tsp. dried)
1 tbsp. white wine vinegar
½ tsp salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
4 halibut steaks (each about 4 oz.)
additional freshly squeezed lemon juice

In a small bowl, whisk together garlic, basil, lemon juice, oregano, vinegar, salt and pepper. Place halibut steaks in a shallow dish and brush with marinade, coating evenly. Cover and refrigerate for a minimum of 20 minutes or for up to 1 hour. Meanwhile, preheat contact grill.

Spray both sides of grill with vegetable cooking spray or oil. Place halibut on grill, close lid and grill for 5 to 6 minutes or until fish is opaque and flakes easily with a fork. Sprinkle with freshly squeezed lemon juice.

I would like to thank my family and many friends for their kindness & support which was shown to me during my recuperation period since Oct 1st. You have made my ordeal much easier.

Thanks again.

Cotler promotes 'justice dialogue' in the Mideast

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler has been to the Middle East many times over the years and no matter where he travelled, talk usually turned to the Arab-Israeli conflict and "the occupation."

However, during his recent one-week visit to Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories, the atmosphere was quite different. In the region to promote a "justice dialogue," Cotler said he found the level of invective greatly toned down. His interlocutors in each of the Arab jurisdictions were eager to discuss matters pertaining to justice, even when the suggestion was made to co-operate with Israel in doing so.

For their part, Israeli officials said they were likewise ready to meet with their Arab neighbours in a multilateral forum convened by Canada in which issues of justice, good governance and human rights would be discussed. A date for the first meeting will likely be set after the upcoming Palestinian presidential election.

"I didn't hear the 'blame Israel' dynamic of years past, the invective that was replete in years past," Cotler said in a telephone interview. "I'm not saying it wasn't there, but it didn't overtake the conversation."

Even his talks with officials of the Palestinian Authority and members of civil society focused on democratizing Palestinian life. "I saw change in rhetoric, in the aspirations, in the orientation, a clear desire to live in a democratic Palestine," he said.

The democratization of Palestinian society could help make conflict with Israel less likely, Cotler suggested. Historically, democracies do not wage war on each other, so any steps taken by Palestinian society in that direction would enhance peace prospects and ensure security for Israel and a future state of Palestine, he said.

During his visit, Cotler participated in a series of bilateral human rights dialogues, which were similar to earlier talks with justice ministers from Indonesia, Bangladesh and Vietnam. He also addressed university audiences in Israel and Cairo, spoke to Palestinian legislators in Ramallah, and met with judges, politicians, NGOs and intellectuals in the region.

He delivered the same public speech in each of the countries, with minor modifications to take into account the venue.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler

In it, he discussed five priorities of the Canadian justice agenda: the relationship between security and human rights; the promotion of democracy, human rights, good governance and the rule of law; protecting the rights of children and minorities; combating hatred, racism, discrimination and intolerance; and the creation of an international justice system through the development of national justice systems.

Each justice minister he met with agreed to establish a dialogue about justice reform in their own jurisdictions and to meet with the others in the proposed Mideast forum to be hosted by Canada.

Bringing all the parties together could produce a "peace dividend" around a shared commitment to the same priorities, and a dialogue to achieve those goals, Cotler said.

Domestic concerns are motivating people in the region. "They are beginning to realize that it's in their self interest" to advance a democratic agenda. "It's something these societies need," Cotler said.

"A different dynamic is at work. That dynamic is inclined on a domestic orientation to build a better life for their people," he added.

Cotler, who was the first minister of the new Canadian government to visit the region, said he went on the trip after consulting with Prime Minister Paul Martin and Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew.

While in Ramallah, Cotler announced Canadian initiatives to assist with the upcoming Palestinian election, including the participation of 20 election observers and two experts from Elections Canada, as well as a grant to help encourage voter participation and accreditation.

Israeli Bedouin firm believer in coexistence

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Local supporters heard first-hand how Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) changed the life of a young Bedouin man who was given the opportunity to receive a higher education.

Jamal Alkirnawi, 24, who graduated from BGU with a BA in health system management and worked with Bedouin youth, was the guest speaker at the 35th annual general meeting of the Canadian Associates of BGU. He is in Montreal this year as one of 11 fellows of the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (MMEP), taking a special graduate social work course alongside other Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians.

Alkirnawi related how he grew up in the Bedouin town of Rahat in the desert, amid unemployment, poverty and overcrowding, in a family of seven children.

When he was in Grade 9 at the local high school, he became involved with National Student Council of Israel, a nationwide association of high school students. From 1994 to '97, he was the only Bedouin representative on the council.

This proved to be a turning point in his life. He got the chance to tour Israel, visiting its major cities for the first time and gaining an appreciation of the value of education. When he visited Jewish schools, he realized how much better they were and was inspired by the students' motivation.

"I couldn't have achieved anything where I came from," he said, if he had not been exposed to this different world.

Thanks to a scholarship, he was admitted to BGU.

In his first year at BGU, he become involved in a community project that included volunteer work in seniors homes, which also opened his eyes to other cultures. By his second year, he was active in a program at BGU to promote understanding between Jewish and Arab students. He became a firm believer from then on in the importance of dialogue and coexistence, he said.

He was the first Arab to participate in the March of the Living in Poland, a trip that usually gives Jewish teenagers a first-hand view of prewar Jewish life and sites of the Holocaust.

Upon his return, Alkirnawi said he tried to "pass on the lessons I learned," writing his reflections in an Arabic article. "I want to give to others what I know."

Since then, he has worked in Bedouin villages, with the support of the New Israel Fund, encouraging young people to also try to aim for a better life.

"I tell them my own story. I came from the ground. If I did it, others can too," he said, struggling somewhat for the English words.

Studying at McGill is a "dream," he said. He knew about the MMEP in Be'er Sheva, where the MMEP has one of its five community service centres in disadvantaged neighbourhoods. He was impressed with its way of helping people fight for what they are entitled to in the areas of housing, health care and education.

He is looking forward to his second year in the MMEP program, when he will return to Be'er Sheva to work in that centre, which he says is also valuable for its ability to bring together Jews and Arabs to work on common concerns of daily living.

Jamal borrowed the Hebrew expression, "If there is no bread, there is no Torah," to make his point that if people don't have the basic necessities taken care of, there can be no peace.

Jim Torczyner, MMEP founder and director, said that without BGU's co-operation, the MMEP could never have gotten off the ground. BGU is the sole Israeli university partner in the MMEP, with the University of Jordan and the Palestinian An-Najah and Al-Quds universities.

Alkirnawi represents the kind of courageous young person the MMEP is looking for, he said. "Jamal insisted on his right to get an education. Even when his roommate at BGU was a settler, he stayed focused on that goal."

Torczyner conducted more than 100 interviews before selecting the 11 fellows this year, and Alkirnawi is the only Israeli Arab in the group.

"Being in the middle of the Arab and Israeli Jewish fellows, he feels he can make a change on both sides."

Canadian Associates board member Benjamin Sternthal said he found Alkirnawi's presentation "refreshing" and it left him with the sense that there are Arabs with whom Israel can have a constructive relationship.

"We've been banging our heads for the past four years. It was refreshing to hear a Muslim come forward and give us another option," Sternthal, 34, said.

"I fully agree with him that there really is only one choice: coexistence."

Concordia hockey arena likely venue for Barak

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The hockey arena at Concordia University's Loyola campus will likely be the venue where Ehud Barak will speak if the university follows through on its intention to invite the former Israeli prime minister back and he accepts.

After an assessment of various venues at both the Loyola and the downtown Sir George Williams campuses, outside security experts concluded that the Loyola arena is the most readily securable site, Concordia communications director Dennis Murphy said.

Murphy said renovations will be made to the arena to make it even more secure and suitable for appearances by high-profile speakers in time to allow Barak to speak there before the end of the academic year.

This involves certain structural changes and other measures that Murphy did not specify. He also said he could not release the cost involved, but said it was not "exorbitant."

The arena is located in the Loyola athletic complex, which is situated on the south side of Sherbrooke Street opposite the main part of the campus.

Murphy said this relative isolation makes for easily controlled entrance and exit, and it minimizes the disruption to campus life. Avoiding such aggravation was one of the factors Concordia cited in its initial refusal in September to allow Barak on campus, in addition to security concerns, when Concordia Hillel first invited him to speak.

The arena has permanent seating for about 600, but when temporary floors are installed over the ice, it can seat between 1,500 and 2,000 people, Murphy said.

Until 30 years ago, convocation was regularly held there, he added.

Concordia hired the outside experts to conduct a comprehensive review of its facilities.

In a statement, the university said that it "reserves the right to designate the appropriate venue and may decide to hold certain university events at an off-campus venue," despite the beefed-up security planned for the arena.

A risk management committee, headed by Michael Di Grappa, Concordia's vice-president of services, is mandated to review and approve requests for access to university space and, when appropriate, make recommendations to president Frederick Lowy's cabinet.

"Concordia is committed to providing opportunities for diverse points of view to be heard by our students and the community at large," Lowy said in the statement. "However, this has to be balanced with the obligation to ensure the safety and security of the members of the Concordia community, our neighbours and our guests, and to minimize disruption to the academic mission of our university."

Murphy said that once the changes are made to the arena, the size of the expected audience will likely be the main determinant in whether an even is held off-campus.

FEDERATION CJA spokesperson Bram Freedman said his organization would accept a decision to invite Barak to speak at the arena, and he applauded Concordia for making good on its commitment to enhance security.

"Our concern is that Barak be welcomed on campus. If Concordia determines that the arena is the best venue, that's perfectly OK."

But B'nai Brith Canada regional director Bill Surkis said he thinks the arena is not the most appropriate venue for someone of Barak's stature.

"We're disappointed that it is not the downtown campus, at the main auditorium in the Hall building. The downtown campus is where the vast bulk of the students are, and it is more prestigious. If they can invest in more security in one venue, they can do it at another, certainly one on the main campus."

B'nai Brith is proceeding with its discrimination complaint against Concordia with the Quebec Human Rights Commission for suppressing "the Jewish voice" on campus.

Citing the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, which protects freedoms of expression and assembly, the complaint speaks of a "poisoned atmosphere" for Jewish students since 2001. That's when, according to B'nai Brith, the university "allowed the dissemination of a student handbook that contained anti-Semitic material, glorified violence and advocated civil disobedience."

B'nai Brith alleges this permission led to the violent protest in September 2002 against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"Since then, Jewish students report that they have been subjected to harassment, intimidation and even assault, which the university has refused or neglected to prevent."

The complaint characterized the Sept. 29 decision by Concordia to bar Barak from campus as the culmination of a pattern.

"This has established a modus operandi of deferring to the wishes of anti-Israel agitators on campus and surrendering to threats of violence... Difficulties in maintaining public order cannot be used by the university as an excuse for silencing the Jewish voice on campus."

Surkis said the human rights commission has acknowledged receipt of the complaint, but has not made it known whether it will investigate.

Bank head lauds fence

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The security fence between Israel and the Palestinians has had a beneficial effect on Israel's economy, the head of Bank Leumi le-Israel said here recently.

The fence has been "important" in reducing terror attacks and improving tourism, board chair Eitan Raff said at a reception hosted by Bank Leumi's local office and co-sponsored by FEDERATION CJA and the Quebec-Israel Committee.

"It has increased consumer confidence," he said.

Raff said that while he is a "bit more optimistic" about Israel's economy overall, its biggest economic hurdle remains an undesirably high unemployment rate of about 10.5 per cent.

That's a figure "we can't live with," he said, adding that the long-term effect is potentially "disastrous."

But Raff foresees that rate improving by half a percentage point with terrorism down and the world's economy expanding.

Although Israel can boast about being a world leader in the high-tech field, Raff said, it also faces unique challenges, since geographically it is an "island economy" with neighbours that don't want to do business with it.

"The synergy between our economy and our neighbours is nonexistent."

Nevertheless, Raff extolled the successes of both Bank Leumi and the Jewish state.

Raff said the 102-year-old bank is helping to fulfil Theodor Herzl's dream of a Jewish state proudly operating its own thriving financial institutions.

Although Bank Hapoalim is Israel's largest commercial bank – with 2004 assets of just over $59.1 billion (all figures US) – Bank Leumi, with $56.3 billion, is a close second.

Raff described his institution as a leading international financial player, with total assets, including those under management, of $105 billion, as well as hundreds of branches in Israel and branches in 21 other countries, including offices in Montreal and Toronto.

Out of the world's top 1,000 banks, Raff said, Bank Leumi ranks 136th, and its net profits soared more than 180 per cent between 2002 and 2003.

With more than one-third of its banking activities taking place outside Israel, "we have clear international credentials," Raff said.

The bank likes to see itself as a "global boutique," he said, offering a full range of "private, commercial, corporate and retail banking services," including international private banking for large clients.

Raff said that leading one of Israel's largest financial institutions in a country with a small economy presents its own challenges, particularly in trying to compete with bigger players on the world stage.

He also praised Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for his policy of "selling off everything the government has," adding that "generally, he's been right."

But Raff said that your view of the privatization drive "all depends [on] how much compassion you have," since it has obliged more people to look for jobs.

He noted that Israel's gross domestic product is relatively tiny – $120 billion, compared to the United States' $103 trillion. Eighty per cent of Israel's GDP is dependent on foreign trade – "one of the highest rates in the world" – compared to 22 per cent in the United States.

Gilda's Club, JGH open a wellness centre

MONTREAL – Gilda's Club Montreal, which closed its doors this summer because of financial difficulties, is joining with the Jewish General Hospital's Hope & Cope program to open a wellness centre for cancer patients and their families. It is expected to be in operation by 2006.

The centre will offer support, information and programs to help patients live with cancer.

Under an agreement between the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) and Gilda's Club, the Hope & Cope Wellness Centre will receive a donation from Gilda's Club after its four-storey house at 1929 de Maisonneuve Blvd. W. is sold. The money will help fund construction of the wellness centre.

Gilda's Club Montreal opened in 2000, as part of an international network, to provide a home-like drop-in centre and a variety of free educational and social programs. Hope & Cope, which is based in the JGH, was founded 23 years ago and is based on the philosophy that former cancer patients are in the best position to support those who are recently diagnosed. Over the years, a gamut of information and practical services have been added.

"Programs in the wellness centre will be closely linked to the hospital's new Segal Comprehensive Cancer Centre, which is now under construction, and will group together a wide array of medical services and research activities," said JGH president Stanley Plotnick. "Support programs, as offered over the years by both Hope & Cope and Gilda's Club, are a critical part of cancer treatment. We are extremely proud to be able to continue to expand the programs of Hope & Cope, as well as add many of the excellent programs that were offered by Gilda's Club, which have proved to be so valuable to cancer patients and their families."

Education key to fighting anti-Semitism

I believe education is the most effective means of combating anti-Semitism. Culture, which is an integral part of education, is also an effective antidote against anti-Semitism, hate and barbarism. We must change the atmosphere and the climate. This effort of education and culture must begin in the home. Then, in kindergarten, in elementary school... It has to become a major priority. Each nation in Europe, and in the rest of the world too, has a duty to annihilate the poisonous serpent that is anti-Semitism. They must react the minute the vile beast raises its head to kill with its poison.

CJN: Then education and culture must be priorities?

Wiesel: I am absolutely convinced that culture and education can stop barbarism, which is a contagious disease. Even more than through political will, it is through culture that Europe will accomplish its mission of unification. The fight against barbarism does not take place between two cultures but between two concepts of humanity. One swallows us up, the other illuminates us.

CJN: For all those who, like you, have personally experienced the horrors of anti-Semitism, is there any meaning in the idea of a "new anti-Semitism," which is in style now?

Wiesel: It's true that people today talk of a new anti-Semitism, but anti-Semitism is still anti-Semitism. There aren't two kinds. Some aspects of today's anti-Semitism are perhaps different. Until recently, traditional anti-Semitism originated with the extreme right. Today this scourge comes from the extreme left. For political reasons, the extreme left tends to get all tied up in a rhetoric marked by anti-Semitism. The extreme right is anti-Semitic for racial, ethnic or religious reasons. But the anti-Semite doesn't change. He stays the same. He detests the people of Israel, the nation of Israel and the State of Israel – for him, they are all the same.

CJN: In your book, there is a magnificent chapter called "Israel, a miracle." The future of the Jewish state seems to preoccupy you.

Wiesel: That doesn't mean every Jew has to feel he is Israeli. I'm not Israeli, but I feel so close to Israel that anything that happens to the country touches me deeply. As a Jew of the Diaspora, I love Israel in happy times and sad. I don't live in Israel, but I could not live without Israel. I always worry about the future of Israel. When I open the paper every morning, the first thing I look for is news about Israel.

Having said that, can we criticize the State of Israel? I certainly could not. I have made a number of fierce enemies in the extreme left camp because I refuse to criticize or condemn the Jewish state. But who am I to censor or limit the free speech of those who do criticize Israel?

We must be on the watch. You often read leftist articles, sometimes by Jews who criticize and revile Israel with an astounding vehemence. They attack Israel so ardently that their words often take on an anti-Semitic flavour.

CJN: Do you think the death of Yasser Arafat means a new era in Israeli-Palestinian relations?

Wiesel: Yes, I am more optimistic. Yasser Arafat was the greatest obstacle to peace. Yitzhak Rabin was a friend of mine. Two weeks before his assassination, we met in New York. We spent a long time discussing the political situation in Israel. He told me something then that struck me greatly and that has remained engraved in my memory. "In the beginning," he said, "I thought that Arafat was the solution. Now, I know he is the problem."

I thought he was referring to Arafat's inflexible ideological ideas, which were an obstacle to peace. "No, not at all," Rabin answered. "The problem is that Arafat is a very corrupt man, not on the ideological or political level, but on the financial level. Today, he has millions of dollars in his personal bank accounts, including in Israeli banks. If you want, I can show you irrefutable proof of the money he has deposited in these Israeli bank accounts."

This was not Arafat's money, but some of the international funds allocated to the Palestinians, which he diverted for his own profit, without feeling any guilt. While the Palestinian people were dying of hunger and despair, their leader was keeping thousands of dollars in his bank accounts.

CJN: Is it possible that a new generation of Palestinian leaders who are more democratic than Arafat might take power in the Palestinian Authority?

Wiesel: Yes. I hope that there will soon be a new, more pragmatic, more realistic generation of Palestinian leaders. Abu Mazen (Mahmoud Abbas) and Abu Ala (Ahmed Qureia), two possible successors to Arafat, should form a government in which they would share a rotating presidency, in order to avoid internal strife. This rotation system, which Israel has used in the past, could ensure more political stability in the new Palestinian Authority. For one year, one of them would be president, and the next year, the other would lead the PA. The first decision that they have to make is to disarm the terrorist groups.

CJN: America, your adoptive country of which you have been a citizen since 1963, is currently in a war with Iraq. The direction this conflict is taking is becoming more poisonous every day. Does this worry you?

Wiesel: In Europe, there is hate for America, but also for Israel. The two countries the Europeans hate the most are the largest country in the world and the smallest. The Americans and the Israelis have the same enemies today.

As for Iraq, we must still give President George Bush credit for one important thing. Before the war in Iraq broke out, there was not a single news service in the world that didn't say Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. Leading political Israelis, the prime minister, the minister of defence, told me so several times. Israel did not want this war because it felt its most threatening enemy today is not Iraq, but Iran, which is currently developing nuclear weapons. But when the American president received his information, I told myself he did not have the right not to take it into consideration. Since I didn't have access to those sources of information, I don't know if it was good or unfounded. It's easy to understand this now that we know there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

The fact that these arms have not been found should not make us forget one irrefutable truth. Saddam Hussein was a savage ruler, a mass murderer, a mad assassin who had tens of thousands of Iraqis killed. When he had powerful weapons of destruction, he used them against his own people. How can we forget his villainous murders, his common graves, his torture chambers? I am happy that he is no longer there. If I had known then what I know now, would I have been for or against this war? I honestly don't know.

CJN: The 20th century was marked by appalling barbarism and human slaughter. As a survivor of the Shoah, do you dread the 21st century?

Wiesel: The 21st century will be a century of very serious threats, a source of anxiety that will bring us close to despair. Every time I am in class and I see young students, I am afraid and I feel sorry for them because this century is theirs, not mine. It is a century that began badly. Do you remember Dec. 31, 1999? The entire world was joyfully celebrating the end of the 21st century. Everywhere, people drank champagne, the hugged each other in the streets. They danced. There were festivities worldwide. People were convinced of one thing. The 20th century was over. Let it go! We thought then that the 21st century would be better. Only four years into the new century, the world is again living in absolute fear.

CJN: Fear of nuclear, chemical or biological terrorism?

Wiesel: Without any doubt, terrorism will be the scourge of the 21st century. Worse than AIDS. Despite the human ravages that AIDS continues to cause, especially in Africa, the fight against the disease is making some progress. New medications have been developed that let those suffering from AIDS live almost normal lives. We know how to attack this horrible illness, how to prevent it. Suicide terrorism is a worldwide nebula that – I don't like to say it out loud – can do a lot of harm, cause unimaginable destruction. It's an endemic evil that, especially in moments of despair, appears incurable.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The mercilessness of Asia's tsunami grew clearer last week as worst-hit Indonesia sharply raised its death toll, taking the number of fatalities around the whole Indian Ocean region above 120,000.

Health Ministry sources told Reuters just under 80,000 had died in Indonesia's northern Aceh province, which was close to the undersea quake, some 28,000 more than previously announced. Two sources said the toll would be officially announced soon.

There were mounting concerns for the fate of 17 Israelis still missing in the area. Evidence suggests that five of them have been killed.

Many parts of northern Sumatra island have yet to be reached by rescue crews and the toll is expected to rise.

Five Israelis who had been missing after Sunday's tsunami were found during the night last week.

Seven other Israelis were evacuated by military helicopter from the tsunami-stricken area in southern Sri Lanka. One of the group received medical treatment aboard the helicopter after sustaining injuries in the disaster.

A rescue unit from Israel's Phoenix Insurance Company located the seven, and dispatched a helicopter to evacuate them from the site, since reaching the area by land was problematic. The seven were transferred to the Sri Lankan capital of Colombo, and were to be flown to Israel last week.

Foreign Ministry sources at Israel's embassy in Bangkok insisted last week that they have yet to receive evidence of positively identified Israeli fatalities.

Debris from the tsunami's devastation is seen on Phi Phi Islands in Krabi province, southern Thailand. Rescuers scoured the sea for missing tourists as fears of disease grew. The disaster spared no one. Western tourists were killed sunbathing on beaches, poor villagers drowned in homes by the sea and fishermen died in flimsy boats. The 21-year-old grandson of Thai King Bhumibol Adulyadej was killed on a jet-ski.

The number of Israelis who had yet to make contact with their families or Israeli officials as of Dec. 30 fell to 17, with embassy officials estimating that the number will continue to fall.

Of the 17, 11 were missing in Thailand, one in Sri Lanka, and five in southern India. All of the Israelis who were on India's Andaman Islands were finally located.

In Thailand, two Israeli women who were moderately to seriously hurt in the tsunami were admitted to a Bangkok hospital. Both were suffering from multiple contusions and fractures, and one of them underwent surgery. Hospital sources said they expected doctors to allow them to fly back to Israel within a few days.

The two were travelling together in Thailand, and were in Koh Phi Phi when the tsunami struck. Despite their injuries, the two managed to make their own way to high ground, where they eventually collapsed. They were found the next day by other tourists, and helped back to the shore, from where they were evacuated to Bangkok. They made contact with their families only 24 hours after the disaster.

Last week, the joint ZAKA and Israel Police's Forensic Unit delegation arrived in Phuket. The 12-member delegation has set up a command centre, but has yet to begin the process of identifying disaster victims.

Israel's consul in Bangkok, Yaakov Dvir, who is in Phuket, said that the delegation was to visit the island's makeshift morgues today with items it had brought from Israel, including dental records and photographs, in an effort to identify possible Israeli fatalities.

The large concentration of bodies of tourists was in Krabi, and some members of the Israeli delegation went there to begin their work.

Commenting on fears that Thai authorities would be forced soon to order immediate mass burials due to the inability of preserving the large number of corpses and the threat of widespread disease, an Israeli embassy official said Bangkok had explicitly said it would not bury the bodies of foreigners until they are identified. "In any event, we need to move as quickly as possible," he said.

A second Israel Police delegation, led by Lt.-Col. Colonel Yitzhak Kornin, who heads the forensic unit's body identification division, also left for Bangkok last week. Other members of the delegation included two identification technicians, two investigators who were to collate information on the missing Israelis, a dentist, and a doctor from the Abu Kabir Forensic Medicine Institute.

The Foreign Ministry also assembled a team of psychologists who were to work with the families of Israeli casualties. Two of the psychologists are in Phuket, with a third in Bangkok.

Israelis blast settlers' call to wear Nazi-style stars

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Sometimes silent protest gets more attention than violence, a group of Gaza Strip settlers has discovered.

The campaign by some of the 8,000 Gaza settlers slated for evacuation to wear orange, Nazi-style Star of David badges has stirred fierce controversy in the Jewish state.

It was not clear how many settlers were taking part in the protest, which immediately was denounced by the Yesha Council, the main settler group.

But the idea of invoking the Holocaust fuelled already raging fears that the removal of 21 settlements from Gaza and another four from the West Bank next year under Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's "disengagement" plan could lead to major civil strife.

"It is important that the memory of the Shoah remain a unifying factor in Israeli society – not the opposite," Yad Vashem director Avner Shalev said.

"The residents of Gush Katif," a Gaza settlement bloc, "are sending an appalling and misguided message to the people of Israel," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, who was visiting Israel.

"While the settlers have every right to peacefully and democratically protest this plan, likening the Holocaust to this political process, no matter how painful, has the effect of fuelling Holocaust denial by delegitimizing the unprecedented horror of the Shoah. Furthermore, utilizing Holocaust imagery in this way is an offence to Holocaust survivors, the Jewish people and taints the memory of its victims."

Allusions to Nazi persecution have crept steadily into the rhetoric of many Israeli right-wingers. Some likened the disengagement plan to deportation notices served to European Jews destined for the death camps.

And there is at least one precedent for linking the star idea to violence: Baruch Goldstein, the settler who carried out the 1994 massacre of Palestinians in a Hebron mosque, was known to wear a yellow Star of David in protest against the 1993 Oslo peace accords.

So it was no surprise to find Israeli notables across the political spectrum uniting against the new Gaza initiative.

"Saddening as it might be to force a person to move house, this is not the concentration camps, the gas chambers, nor the chimneys of Auschwitz," said the leader of the centrist Shinui Party, Yosef Lapid, who is a Holocaust survivor.

Shaul Yahalom, of the pro-settler National Religious Party, noted that many Israelis who opposed the disengagement plan had taken to flying orange protest pennants from their cars, and said that should suffice.

"The people of Gush Katif have gone too far in wearing a badge that hints at dark periods of history," Yahalom said. "The disengagement plan is disastrous, but we must keep things in proportion."

JTA correspondent Dina Kraft in Tel Aviv contributed to this story.

Pius XII told churches not to return Holocaust war babies

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — The Vatican instructed the Catholic church in France not to return Jewish children to their families after the Holocaust, according to a letter dated November 20, 1946, that was published late last month in the Italian daily Corriere della Sera.

The children had been placed in the church's care to save them from Nazi murder, but after the war, the church was instructed to return them to surviving parents only if the children had not been baptized.

The letter containing these instructions was sent by the Holy Office to Angelo Roncalli – later Pope John XXIII – who was then the papal representative in Paris.

"Please note that this decision has been approved by the Holy Father," the letter emphasizes, referring to Pope Pius XII.

The letter reveals how the controversial wartime pope sought to restrict the number of children the church returned to their families by, among other things, instructing that baptized children "may not be entrusted to institutions that are not in a position to guarantee them a Christian upbringing."

As for orphans who had not been baptized, the church must not hand them over to any "persons who have no rights over them," the letter stated.

Roncalli had a reputation for favouring Jews when he previously served as the Holy See's envoy to Istanbul.

In Paris, he helped many Jews escape to Israel, and he disobeyed the Vatican instructions by helping to return Jewish minors to their families.

On July 19, 1946, he sent a letter to the chief rabbi in Israel, Isaac Herzog (the father of Chaim Herzog, who later became Israeli president), in which he gave Rabbi Herzog permission "to use his [Roncalli's] authority so these children can return to their original environment."

Amos Luzzato, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, said in response to the letter that it indicates "the Vatican completely ignored the Holocaust and murder of Jews. There is a sticking to theological arguments as though this were an ordinary situation, when in practice these children were not entrusted to churches to convert to Christianity but to save them from murder."

The publication of the letter to Roncalli will only add to the controversy surrounding Pope Pius XII, making it difficult for the Vatican to ignore accusations that the Vatican under his tenure did not do enough to combat Nazi persecution of Jews, and even helped Nazi war criminals to evade justice.

The latest revelations are also likely to complicate efforts by Pope John Paul II to lay the groundwork for beatifying Pius XII.

Israelis fight AIDS

Israeli scientists claimed a breakthrough in AIDS treatment. Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem said its researchers had developed a vaccine that significantly strengthens the body's immune system against the auto-immune aftereffects of HIV infection. The vaccine could dramatically improve the prospects of AIDS patients receiving treatment. The researchers found that though treatment with a common cocktail of AIDS medications kills the virus, the immune system continues to kill healthy cells. While the virus disappears in many patients, their immune systems remain dangerously ineffective against foreign elements, and many of the patients end up dying from related complications. The new vaccine is in the clinical-trial stage, Hadassah said.

Ma'ariv's English site closes

The Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv took down its English-language website. The site went down last month after the newspaper decided not to extend its contract with Joya, a New York-based company that funded the site, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Palestinian prisoners freed

Israel released 159 Palestinians from its jails. The prisoners, most of them jailed for links to terrorist groups and the rest in detention for working in Israel without permits, were freed in a gesture of gratitude toward Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who last month granted early release to an Israeli businessman accused of spying. The releases also were intended to foster goodwill in the Palestinian Authority ahead of its Jan. 9 presidential elections.

Hamas wins nine of 26 races

Hamas won nine of 26 municipal elections in the West Bank, suggesting stronger support for the terrorist group than was anticipated. Last month's elections were in communities considered to be strongholds of Fatah, the mainstream Palestinian movement and the party of Mahmoud Abbas, the candidate favoured to win Jan. 9 elections for Palestinian Authority president.

Israeli terror victims down

The number of Israelis killed in terrorist attacks dropped last year. According to the Israel Defence Forces, 118 Israelis were killed by terror attacks in 2004, a drop of 44 per cent from 2003. The army attributes the decrease to its security barrier, anti-terror operations and greater coordination among security forces.

Israel's economy on the rise

Israel's economy is projected to grow by 4.2 per cent in 2004. Exports and tourism are driving the growth. The slowdown in Palestinian-Israeli violence allowed for a revival in tourism, while an increase in demand for technology products drove export growth. The economy grew by 1.3 per cent in 2003.

Number of Muslim, Christian Arab volunteers in IDF growing

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The deaths of five soldiers from the Israel Defence Forces' desert reconnaissance unit – the so-called Bedouin unit – in an attack on an army outpost near Rafah last month drew public attention to the service of Bedouin in the IDF.

But reports on the incident paid little attention to the fact that most of the dead were not Bedouin. Three of the five soldiers killed were Muslim Arabs from villages in the Galilee who had volunteered for military service.

Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon paid condolence visits to the three families, the first such visits by a chief of staff. During one of the visits, Ya'alon shook the hand of a relative of one of the soldiers, a Palestinian woman from Jenin who had married into the family of the dead soldier and took up residence in Israel.

If soldiers from the Bedouin community encounter hostile reactions and charges of aiding Israel's war against their Palestinian brothers, the situation is far worse for Muslim and Christian Arabs.

While Bedouin have been volunteering for the IDF, primarily as trackers, for many years, Muslim and Christian Arabs have been doing so, on a very small scale, only since the 1990s. The numbers increased slightly prior to 2000, but then fell significantly with the start of the intifadah in September of that year and the killing of 13 Arab citizens by Israeli police in the October riots.

Nevertheless, partial figures given to Ha'aretz by the IDF indicate a renewed increase in the enlistment of Muslim and Christian youth over the past two years.

The number of Muslim volunteers was 64.5 per cent higher in 2003 than in 2000, while the enlistment of Christians increased by 16 per cent over the same period.

A senior source at the IDF's personnel directorate said that incomplete figures for 2004 show a further increase, at a rate of some 20 per cent, in the enlistment of youth from both sectors.

The IDF does not furnish exact numbers, but it appears that the annual number of volunteers from both sectors together does not exceed 150. About half serve in infantry units, primarily the Desert Reconnaissance Unit. Soldiers not medically fit for combat serve in support positions – for instance, as drivers.

A source at the personnel directorate attributed some of this increase to the intensive work carried out by IDF representatives in Arab villages, particularly those with mixed populations.

IDF officials inform high school students and youth movement members of career opportunities in the army, but, the personnel directorate source noted, the IDF tries not to "push its way into" these communities, and focuses only on those it is invited to.

IDF has boosted its Hebrew-language teaching activities among members of the desert reconnaissance unit

Communities that are also home to Druze residents, who are required to enlist, and Bedouin are considered more likely targets, because they are more open to inviting the IDF representatives.

"From our point of view, we have an interest in incorporating these populations," the personnel directorate source said. "From the point of view of those who enlist, it is a step toward becoming more a part of Israeli society."

The source added that the IDF has boosted its Hebrew-language teaching activities among members of the desert reconnaissance unit, and has also diversified its professional training program for these soldiers so they can find work after they are discharged.

Israeli college helping to break down prejudices

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Despite their prayers, generations of Israelis have watched their babies grow up to be soldiers.

Today, aspirations for peace in their children's lifetime have become even more painful for Israeli parents because the Oslo years made them believe things could be so different, says Sagi Melamed, director of external relations and development at Tel Hai Academic College, a relatively new institution of higher learning in the hills of the Upper Galilee.

It was only three years ago that "we touched peace," said Melamed, referring to the time when negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority seemed encouraging, and joint programs in almost every field enabled the two peoples to meet formally and informally as they explored different levels of dialogue.

While the collapse of the peace process and the subsequent intifadah may have discouraged most Israelis, it is important to encourage the view that peace is still possible, Melamed said, especially when it comes to relations between Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs.

Melamed, who was in Toronto recently as part of a UJA Federation fundraising mission, said Tel-Hai College offers Israeli Jewish, Muslim, Christian, Bedouin and Druze students the opportunity to come together and break down preconceived prejudices so that dialogue can develop among the diverse peoples that share the Land of Israel.

According to its catalogue, Tel Hai College was established in 1996 as part of a national effort to extend academic educational opportunities into every area of Israel. It offers undergraduate degrees in science and technology, the social sciences and humanities, as well as certification in several other fields, mainly related to education.

Over the past four years, the school's enrolment has grown from 900 to more than 1,800 students. Minorities represent about 20 per cent of the student population, and Melamed said this mix encourages a unique level of dialogue between Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs.

Located at the site of an early pioneering settlement just north of Kiryat Shmona, the campus is surrounded by mountains, rivers and valleys. Melamed noted that the peaceful mood of the area makes it easier for "young adults who have had little positive contact with each other to study and interact."

With this in mind, the college established the Center for Education in Democracy and Peace Studies, which provides mediation seminars, a year-long seminar in Jewish-Arab Dialogue and consultation and support for Arab-Jewish student projects.

Melamed, who has an MA in Middle Eastern studies and negotiation from Harvard University, believes that the strong educational

"Some of our departments, such as social work and biotechnology are in the front line of Israeli academia," Melamed said.

He spoke most proudly, however, about the education programs and the support systems in place for Tel Hai students with learning disabilities.

Through state of the art technology and mentoring programs, Melamed said, 23 per cent of the honours graduates come from the 15 per cent of the student body who have learning disabilities, including dyslexia, attention deficit disorder or anxiety disorder.

Mentoring programs are available to teach organizational skills, and sophisticated software is in place to read and translate texts for students.

In addition, Biofeedback, the use of computers to detect patterns in anxiety levels, is used to help students learn to control their nervousness, Melamed said.

These types of programs promote success for all students – Jewish and Arab – at Tel Hai. In this environment, the students perceive that things can be different for themselves personally, a feeling that then translates to a more positive outlook on life in general, he said.

Within the college, "the goal is to [show that] a model of a society based on positive and equal relationships between people can be developed."

However, while Melamed advocates for the empowerment of those Israeli Arabs who are honestly seeking a path towards coexistence, he also acknowledges that peace will come about only if the Jewish state continues to be strong.

"You can make peace from a strong position," he said, adding that it would be wrong to ignore those among the Palestinians and the Israeli Arabs who would like the State of Israel to be gone.

"But, for our sake, for the sake of a Jewish democratic state, we must be able to live with our neighbours."

Tel Hai, Melamed believes, can teach how to do that.

Company encourages kindness in children

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It is not uncommon for businesses to contribute financially or in kind to charitable events and causes. Mr. Case Inc, a company that sells cases of grocery items, is no exception. For years, it has been a generous donor to many causes.

In honour of the company's 20th anniversary, however, Marc Levin, president, and Garret Berk, vice-president, decided to contribute in "a more meaningful way," they said.

Beverley Jones established The Kerry Lynn Foundation to honour the memory of her daughter Kerry Lynn Cochran Anderson, who died unexpectedly 10 years ago.The focus of the foundation is to encourage understanding and kindness in children.

The Kerry Lynn Foundation and Mr. Case Inc. have collaborated on the Picture the Promise Program, aimed at Ontario children.

Children from The Maple School of Art and The Woodbridge Art School were asked to submit pictures answering the question, "What does kindness mean to you?" More than 300 youngsters submitted entries. Eight winners were chosen, two in each of four age groups.

Viktoria Sciacca, 10, won a prize for the best slogan for the campaign, "Kindness is thinking with your heart."

The effort didn't stop there, project director Rhonda Wolfond explained. Fifteen of the entries (including four of the winners) were put on a poster titled, "It's cool to be kind."

The poster, pictures in bright colours of yellows, greens and blues on a royal blue background, is to be distributed as widely as possible – to schools, doctors' offices, places that deal with children with special needs, and clients of Mr. Case.

Subjects include a western "wanted" poster of a bull, with the title, "Wanted, kindness… Keep the bullying out"; an overweight child, a child in a wheelchair and a black child titled, "Kindness is seeing past people's appearances" and one titled, "Kindness is respecting the differences between an autistic child and yourself."

Wolfond said that Mr. Case had always responded enthusiastically to her requests to help, citing especially her projects for Jacob's Ladder and the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health. They have also given to food banks, the United Way and the Brazilian Ball, among other causes.

Looking for a way to make a "more meaningful" charitable effort, Berk and Levin knew they had found their cause when Berk's son, Rory, was diagnosed with autism. They are concerned that Rory, who "cannot relate to the world in the same way other children can," will suffer because of ignorance, fear and lack of understanding.

A media release said that Berk and Levin hope that "with exposure, education and awareness, children will begin to support, accept and respect people's differences, and go one one step beyond and extend themselves into making their world an easier place."

Levin and Berk hope to issue a poster every year and send it throughout Ontario and Canada.

While Berk's main interest is autism, Levin's is animals. The hope is to find some way to combine those two interests.

The poster can be delivered free of charge in the GTA. Contact Berk at 416-661-2273 or e-mail garret@mrcase.com.

Club named in honour of Gilda Radner

Hope & Cope, an independent nonprofit organization funded entirely by private donations, will continue to be located in the hospital in the Comprehensive Cancer Centre in Pavilion E. However, the wellness centre will be located at a site to be determined, possibly on a nearby hospital-owned property on Côte Ste.Catherine Road, just west of Lavoie Street.

Hope & Cope founder Sheila Kussner noted that, while Hope & Cope is professionally led, its success is based on using the skills and wisdom of some 230 volunteers, who have experience with cancer. Peer support will be a key component of the new wellness centre, she said.

"We welcome this generous donation from Gilda's Club," said Kussner. "This support, plus that of other private donors in the community, is much needed to ensure the success of the wellness centre."

"We are delighted that our members will continue to be able to receive similar support services during the transitional period of construction and after the opening of the wellness centre," said Martin Bogante, president of Gilda's Club Montreal. "We are also proud that Gilda's Club Montreal was able to provide such a valuable service to approximately 800 members annually for the past four years."

The club was named in honour of Gilda Radner, the Saturday Night Live comedian who died of cancer in 1989. It was brought to Montreal through the initiative of its founding members, the late Monica Bergman, Frema Routtenberg, Arlene Mosse, Mireille Shostak, Barry Stein and Bogante.

Dora Award winner juggles acting and motherhood

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Dora Award-winning actor Michelle Polak returns to the stage four months after giving birth to her daughter, Charlie Jane, to perform in Little Dragon at Theatre Passe Muraille.

Making it more enjoyable for her is that both she and her partner, sound designer Lyon Smith, are working on the show, at Passe Muraille's mainspace until Jan. 30, together.

"It is quite a challenge to work in the theatre and raise a four-month-old," says Polak, 32.

"Having a baby is really fun. It is allconsuming at this time, in a most beautiful and positive way. My happiest time is being at home with my partner and child and watching her grow. It is interesting now at this point in my life," she says. "I feel quite satisfied that I don't want much other than to stay healthy and keep my family and loved ones safe and that is about it."

K'Now Theatre and Theatre Passe Muraille's Little Dragon was written by and co-stars K'Now Theatre's artistic director, Keira Loughran.The story was inspired by Loughran's life as a third-generation Chinese Canadian.

"It is about a girl named Jen MacDonald, who is played by Keira Loughran," Polak says. "The show starts off with her in the prologue saying 'I didn't realize I was Chinese until I went to university.' That is the point of departure. She sort of reclaims her roots and discovers some new passions.

"I play Eugenia, a funky Jewish lesbian, Jen's best friend, who exposes her to aikido and supports her exploring and finding her roots."

Polak says the show isn't conventional. "We use martial arts and we use contact to improv, which is a form of physical movement to explore the text."

Polak started acting in film, television and on the stage as a child. Her early work included starring as the baker's wife in Into the Woods and Maria in West Side Story at her childhood synagogue – Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

She came to Toronto in 1992 to study drama at Ryerson, graduating in 1995. She won her Dora – a Toronto award recognizing achievements in theatre, dance and opera – for her work in Beatriz Pizano's For Sale and was nominated for a Dora for her role in The Chair. Recently, she toured internationally in Morris Panych and Wendy Gorling's acclaimed The Overcoat, while pregnant.

"I love theatre. It's a direct medium. You are catching people in real time – at that moment. It is unlike life. It is very exciting in that you can transform, you can be anybody, and you can be old or young," Polak says. "You can explore parts of your personality and then go into areas that you would never, ever want to be. I find with theatre there is a magic to it that is pretty compelling – when it works."

It looks like Barenaked Ladies frontman Steven Page has been busier than we thought. In the article "The Barenaked Ladies Get Some Chanukah Ruach," (CJN Dec. 16, page 31), we said Page and his wife Carolyn have two young sons, Isaac and Benjamin. In fact, they have a third son, Jonah.

'One of the mothers of Israel' publishes two new books

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto author, former teacher and fundraiser Shula Robin, 84, recently published two books, The Tablecloth and Other Short Stories and My Kaleidoscope.

"My life is so full – 24 hours a day is not enough," Robin says. She says she has lived and witnessed a kaleidoscope of Jewish life and Jewish history.

Robin, who was born in Sosnowiec, Poland, and went to Palestine in 1935 to study, participated in the establishment of the State of Israel.

"I feel like one of the mothers of Israel," she says."I was a teacher in Tiberias and fought with the Haganah for the liberation of Tiberias. I was a witness to many historical events, including the Holocaust and the loss of 95 members of my family, the development of relationships between Arabs and Jews, and many tragic events in my life as well as many joys."

Throughout her life, Robin, who was married twice, has melded many vignettes of her life in her book of 15 short stories, The Tablecloth. The stories reflect a multitude of her life experiences. From her stories, it's obvious that she is an observer who loves people.

My Kaleidoscope, Robin's sixth book of poetry, includes poems that have never been published before. Filled with love, her poems, with titles such as Inborn Optimism, Contradictions, A World of Illusion, A Relic of Yesteryear, are a panorama of everyday happenings. My Kaleidoscope is illustrated by Ibolya (Ibi) Kaczer.

Writer June Callwood, in a congratulatory note on the back cover of My Kaleidoscope, says, "I love these poems about life and love and loss and beauty. The one, On the Beach, resonates especially because we share the calm that endless, timeless waves provide."

Some of Robin's poems have been set to music and performed at a concert by composer and singer Michael Shevtsov. A video based on her poem At the Exhibition was produced for Bravo and another video, My Heroic Sisters and I Know Who I Am, was produced by Moviewitz Productions Inc.

Robin becomes animated when she describes her works, which she reads at public libraries, at the Royal Ontario Museum, retirement residences and synagogues.

She has two daughters, Anita Aviad, a veterinarian in research in Toronto, and Betty Mihal Aviad, a psychologist in Los Angeles, and one granddaughter,

"I would love to have a movie made of my life and the history I lived through. People have no ideas of what it was really like in Palestine before the creation of the State of Israel. In those days, we were afraid, but we had a social relationship with the Arabs," Robin says.

For more information or to obtain copies of My Kaleidoscope or The Tablecloth and Other Short Stories, call 416-636-0781.

FRESH FROM YIDDISH STAGE, CANADIAN-ISRAELI ACTOR TO TOUR WITH GERSHWIN MUSICAL

Canadian-Israeli actor Amitai Kedar was in Toronto recently to visit his family before beginning an 11-week North American road tour of the tried-and-true Gershwin musical My One and Only, in which he plays a Russian impresario, Prince Nikolai.

Born in Toronto in 1969, Kedar grew up in Israel and graduated from Tel Aviv University's School of Performing Arts. His roles have included that of the bridegroom in the national Habima theatre production of The Dybbuk and performances in numerous Hebrew independent productions, film and TV dramas in Israel.

He's also drawn attention for his leading roles in a handful of Yiddish plays, including Avraham Goldfaden's Kuni Lemel. His growing involvement in the small closed world of Yiddish theatre seems all the more remarkable because, at least initially, he didn't know any Yiddish: he learned his lines phonetically.

Last year, Kedar participated in an acting workshop in New York, then stayed in the Big Apple to act in The Lady Next Door, the Leon Kobrin play about the Jews of the Lower East Side, mounted by the Folksbiene Yiddish Theatre of Manhattan. He's been involved in a growing list of projects in New York ever since.

Because his English accent sounds generically European, he's been passed over for English roles to play Israelis; more typically, he lands parts of exotic foreigners such as Prince Nikolai, he said. He's also done Shakespeare. He played Egean in a memorable production of The Comedy of Errors. And last June, he gave what one reviewer called a "stand out" performance as a Catholic priest in the play Love in Great Neck.

While he seems cautiously pleased by the momentum his career is attaining, he acknowledges it comes with a down side. "In order to do what I love to do, I'm paying some prices," he said. "For one thing, I'm out of Israel. That's a big price to pay because I miss it."

However, he's likely to remain away from Israel for some time. After the Gershwin road tour, he's got a film role lined up for April. Other significant roles are likely waiting in the wings.

Names in the News: Winnipeg composer Sid Robinovitch was also in town this month, attending a performance of Bone Button Borscht, Barbara Budd's totally wonderful adaptation of the charming Aubrey Davis story to a backdrop of Robinovitch's music from his evocative Suite for Klezmer Band and Orchestra.

"I'm always happy to hear it being played," said Robinovitch, who was here working on a TV soundtrack. "Of course, I've heard various versions of this piece many times."

Born in Brandon, Man., Robinovitch lived in Toronto for 17 years, some of them as a York professor, and has been in Winnipeg the last 18 years. He writes a lot of choral and chamber music and does television work. He wrote the theme for the CBC satirical comedy show The Newsroom.

Theresa Tova

He originally wrote his klezmer suite in about 1990 for the Winnipeg klezmer group Finjam – which performed the Budd-adapted version recently with the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra.

Robinovitch expressed delight with Budd's creative use of the piece in Bone Button Borscht, which made its original debut last year. "I wrote it completely independently," he said. "She was the one who put it together with the story. It was really her baby. She made it work."

Performances are slated for Kitchener on Jan. 20 and Montreal on March 20.

Muslim journalist infiltrated Al Qaeda cell in France

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A joke saved his life.

In the winter of 1986, when Algerian journalist Mohamed Sifaoui was busy finishing a story in his office in Algiers, a colleague popped in and persuaded him to go for a walk.

He wanted to tell Sifaoui a particularly good joke.

Soon after they stepped out, they felt the pressure of a huge explosion. The blast destroyed their building, killing three of their fellow newspapermen and 30 passersby in the street below.

Islamic radicals opposed to Algeria's secular government carried out the attack. "That day I realized something fundamental," he writes in Inside Al Qaeda: How I Infiltrated The World's Deadliest Terrorist Organization. "I absolutely had to fight against the fascist ideology of the Islamists and those who supported it..."

Sifaoui's instructive exposé, published by Granta and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, is an eye-opener, a first-hand look at the dark, menacing face of Islamic fundamentalism and global terrorism, the twin sicknesses of our time.

The horrific incident in Algiers left "indelible marks" on Sifaoui, encouraged him to write this hard-hitting book and prompted him to immigrate to France, where he currently lives.

Sifaoui's book, based on a documentary commissioned by Parisian television station France 2, is the product of tireless legwork and considerable courage.

Disregarding obvious dangers, he insinuated himself into radical Islamic circles in Paris by pretending to be a committed Islamist whose goal was to present a "good image" of Muslims.

His informant was an Islamist extremist named Karim."Naturally I gave him an absolute assurance that his message and probably that of the 'brothers' would be broadcast uncut."

Posing under the pseudonym of Djamel Mostaghanemi, he played his role to the hilt, spouting the Islamic mantras they hold so dear.

And when he met his "brothers," he paid attention to special details. "They forbid the wearing of gold because it is prohibited for men of the Muslim religion. As my wedding ring is made of gold, I couldn't let it be seen in front of them. Another detail: most of them wear their watch on their right hand because that is the side of purity..."

Having won their confidence, Sifaoui learned to be as guileful as they are. He discovered that when they interact with "infidels," they cleverly pay lip service to such concepts as tolerance, understanding and respect.

"Karim didn't infringe the rule followed by Islamists the world over, whether they are self-proclaimed 'moderates' or 'radicals.' They all employ manipulation and 'twin-track' language. It is what they call takiya."

In the West, takiya is better known as double-speak. "What [Karim] actually believed was always the exact opposite of what he reserved for the infidels."

And when they raise funds for their cause, they always tell "infidels" it is meant for the poor.

Sifaoui's "brothers" made no secret of their ultimate objective. As Karim said, "We'll propose Islam to Jacques Chirac or Tony Blair. And if they don't accept Islam, we'll do it by conquest. The whole world must be governed by Allah's word."

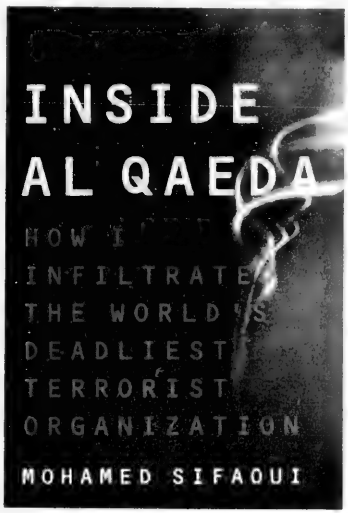
It will come as no surprise that his informants worship Osama bin Laden, the fugitive leader of Al Qaeda, and believe in jihad. Nor will their attitude toward Jews be surprising.

"Islamists never buy from Jewish shopkeepers, though they know very well, let it be said in passing, that the Prophet himself traded with Jews in Medina," he observes.

They also have a fetish about berets.

"What's wrong with my beret?" Sifaoui wonders after Karim looks askance at it.

"Forgive me, my brother, but in that beret, you look like an Orthodox Jew. Our religion forbids us from looking like Jews or infidels."



Sifaoui was quite shocked by Karim's aversion to berets. "I thought I had reached the heart of Muslim fundamentalism, but in fact perhaps what I had really reached was the heart of human stupidity."

Feigning revulsion, Sifaoui offered to throw away his beret.

"No, don't," said Karim. "Sell it to an infidel and then you'll get some money to buy sweets for children."

In frequenting Islamic bookshops, he quickly noticed that works by Muslim extremists espousing Saudi Arabian-style Wahabi doctrine were sold at low, unbeatable prices.

That was the case because Saudi organizations responsible for spreading Wahabism to the four corners of the earth subsidize the publication of such books.

Sifaoui reports that Karim took umbrage at a book clearing bin Laden of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks in the United States."That sort of book tries to show that we are not capable of preparing that type of attack," he quotes Karim as saying indignantly. "We say to its author that we are capable of that – and of worse than that!"

Sifaoui spent three months with Karim and his friends, whom he describes as criminals, and found it to be "a testing exercise for the nerves."

But the experience was beneficial because it confirmed his worst suspicions about Islamic fundamentalism.

Be it driven by Wahabi ideology or a Muslim Brotherhood perspective, Islamism is a "scourge," a form of fascism, that needs to be eradicated, Sifaoui concludes.

"My friends and colleagues have asked me a question – did I at any time feel sympathy towards these brothers whom I had in reality betrayed? Did I feel any remorse? Any qualms? My answer is emphatically no."

He adds: " I saw their false smiles for my colleagues from France 2 before they called them 'filthy infidels.' I heard their language of hate. I saw their contempt for life. I heard their hymn of death."

A footnote – several days after the publication of Inside Al Qaeda, Sifaoui got threatening phone calls, one of which was made by Karim's wife.

But, as he notes, he also received sympathetic letters from French Muslims. One Muslim woman ended her letter with this sentence: "Thank you for showing that not all Muslims are potential terrorists."

Peter Newman looks back on a productive life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The fundamental paradox of Peter Newman's life was that he was both a quintessential insider and a rank outsider.

A Czech Jew who arrived in Canada as a refugee with his parents in 1940, he was the archetypal hard-working immigrant who made good in his adopted homeland.

Transforming himself into one of Canada's most accomplished journalists and authors, Newman edited the Toronto Star and Maclean's and wrote 22 books that celebrated Canadian history, including classics such as Renegade in Power: The Diefenbaker Years and The Canadian Establishment in three volumes.

As a member of Canada's power elite, he hobnobbed with prime ministers and rubbed shoulders with business tycoons. Yet Newman, like the proverbial observer peering into a window, never quite considered himself one of them.

"I felt like an outsider, though less so today," said Newman, whose pungent memoir, Here Be Dragons: Telling Tales of People, Passion and Power, was recently published by McClelland & Stewart.

In this mammoth book, Newman, now 75, makes much of his calculated decision, as a young man, to blend in and join the Canadian mainstream as a WASP, a white Anglo-Saxon Protestant.

He succeeded beyond his wildest dreams, achieving all his successes in WASP institutions. But at the end of the day, as he acknowledged in a recent interview, he was Jewish to his fingertips.

"I always considered myself Jewish and never saw myself as a WASP," said Newman, a soft-spoken man who currently lives in London, England, with his fourth wife, Alvy, a PhD candidate at the University of London.

"I have the temperament of a Jew and I'm more passionate than WASPs, who are bloodless people. You are what you feel. When it comes to the crunch, I'm a Jew. When it comes to daily life, I'm nothing."

Newman, an only child who was raised in the Moravian town of Breclav, was doubtless influenced by his parents, Oscar Karel and Wanda Maria Neumann.

Non-practising, assimilated Jews who never bothered to bar mitzvah their son, the Neumanns were fabulously wealthy and lived on an estate with servants, thanks to Oscar Karel's status as the proprietor of a prosperous sugar beet factory. "So I really didn't feel Jewish," Newman writes.

To gain entry into Canada, at a time when the Canadian government did not look kindly upon Jewish refugees fleeing Nazism, the Neumanns were forced to convert to Roman Catholicism.

"The priest knew we were Jewish. He was saving lives. There was never any thought we'd be Catholic. The story you're hearing now is not unusual for Central European Jews escaping Europe."

Confident that they could survive in Europe, Newman's grandparents, Theodore and Pauline, stayed behind in Czechoslovakia, a mistake that cost them their lives. They were murdered in the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

Newman, whose original first name was Peta, dedicates Here Be Dragons to the nine other Peta Neumanns – aged 10 months to 10 years – who also died in Theresienstadt as victims of Nazism. Their names appear on the camp's memorial wall today.

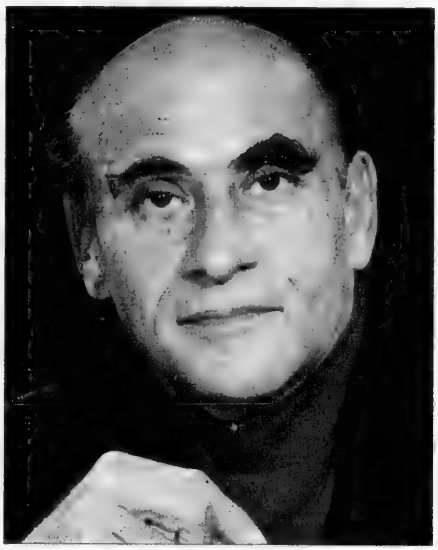
Through a combination of stealth and luck, the Neumanns slipped out of war-torn Europe via France, Italy and Britain. Here Be Dragons, he said, was originally titled Lifelines: Memoirs of a Passionate Outsider. But for a number of reasons, that title was dropped.

Arriving in Canada, the family settled in Freeman, Ont., as fruit-and-vegetable farmers. And though they kept a low profile as Jews, they were treated like outcasts and could not escape the sting of anti-Semitism.

In 1947, Newman's mother placed an ad in The Toronto Daily Star advertising her services as a hat maker. The Karen Ross Company, a wholesale milliner on Wellington Street West, offered her a job interview, yet cautioned, "We are an old established Gentile firm."

"So seldom do you get anti-Semitism in writing," said Newman, referring to the climate of the times. "But this is real." (Newman's mother got the job and stayed briefly, never letting on she was Jewish).

Although his parents never recreated their financial success in Canada, they managed to send Newman to Upper Canada College – that bastion of WASP privilege – and the University of Toronto.



Peter Newman

As a reporter and columnist, he rose quickly. He worked for The Financial Post before jumping to Maclean's and The Toronto Star.

He launched his career as a best-selling author with Flame of Power, a book about Canadian business leaders.

Subsequently, he was editor of the Star, which he ruefully recalls as "an unmanageable beast," and Maclean's, which he fondly remembers.

It is hardly surprising that he drifted into journalism. As he puts it in Here Be Dragons: "When I ultimately arrived in Canada, what I wanted was to gain a voice. To be heard... Unexpectedly, I found myself a writer, not in response to the call of any muse, but because it seemed a good way to establish that voice."

Newman, who describes himself as "a child of the century," never experienced anti-Semitism in his climb to the top, possibly because Canada had largely outgrown its ethnocentrism and racism.

But he has not forgotten the era when Jews, notably the irrepressible Sam Bronfman of Montreal, were barred from the boardrooms of major Canadian corporations and kept out of exclusive social clubs.

Times have changed, and Canada is a better country for it. But the embers of anti-Semitism still smoulder brightly, Newman noted.

He cited the shockingly bitter remarks uttered by native leader David Ahenakew last year and the anti-Semitic snubs that Newman was subjected to in Vienna – the city of his birth – and in Zurich at a yacht club not too long ago.

Newman, who received his Order of Canada in the same year as Ahenakew, has urged the federal government to withdraw Ahenakew's award, but to no avail so far. "It's absurd to keep him on as a member."

In good health despite heart bypass surgery in 1998, Newman has no intention of retiring. "Why would I? Journalists don't have to. You die when you retire. You're bored out of your skull."

At present, he is writing a popular history of Canadian business. "Writing books keeps me alive," he said. "You've got to keep your mind working. It's better than sitting on a rocking chair."

Newman, however, claims that he has transcended ambition, a trait that enabled him to go far, but contributed to three failed marriages. "I'm not feeding the dragon of fame anymore. I'm happily married and I've got two great step-daughters."

"This is my most precious book. It's me. It's my life."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP

Israel & the Jewish World

Tourists return to Israel as security situation improves

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Rappelling down mountain faces in the Judean Desert, bumping along dirt roads by jeep and tucking notes into the Western Wall in Jerusalem, tourists have returned to Israel for winter vacation in the largest numbers since the Palestinian intifadah began more than four years ago.

The perception that Israel is safer than it was a year ago, and renewed hopes for peace in the wake of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's death, are playing their part in luring tourists back, tourism officials and trip organizers said.

"During the intifadah, you literally begged people to come, and now people are begging you to get on the trip," said Marlene Post, president of Hadassah International and the chair of Birthright Israel in North America, who was interviewed while in Israel to help oversee three Hadassah missions that came for winter break.

> Some 1.4 million visitors were expected to come to Israel by the end of 2004

Across the board, more tourists are coming – Jewish and Christian, students and families – part of an overall surge in tourism in 2004. Some 1.4 million tourists were expected to come to Israel by the end of 2004, a 44 per cent increase over 2003.

"The increase in tourism [last] year and the optimistic outlook for 2005 can be attributed to an increasingly positive atmosphere in the region, an improvement in the security situation and the renewal of intensive marketing efforts around the world," Tourism Ministry spokesperson Golan Yossifon said.

Among the visitors were a group of 127 from New York City's Park Avenue Synagogue, one of the largest synagogue missions to come to Israel since the intifadah began.

Throughout 2004, the synagogue focused its congregation on Israel – by revamping its religious school curriculum to put Israel at centre stage, and by hosting lecture and festivals of Israeli art and film.

The climax was climbing on a plane and exploring "the complexities of Israel for eight days," said shul member and lawyer Paul Corwin, who organized the trip.

The group's first stop was a professional basketball game in Tel Aviv, while the last was a tour of the hall where David Ben-Gurion declared Israel's independence in 1948.

For Bill, a New York businessman on the tour, coming to Israel for the first time in December was a powerful experience. He and his family had planned to come four years ago, but they cancelled after the intifadah began.

"I'm not a religious Jew," he said, but coming here "cut me deep to my core and made me aware of my Jewish consciousness. If anyone cares anything about their Jewish identity, then they should come visit here, because this is like nothing I've experienced before. This is the Jewish homeland."

Birthright Israel, the free trip to the Jewish state for Diaspora youth who have never visited on a peer trip, has also experienced high numbers, bringing about 8,500 youth to Israel this winter.

The Jewish Agency for Israel saw a dramatic rise in the number of high school and college students that it brings to Israel from around the world. Some 4,600 students from countries as diverse as South Africa, France and Australia came for their December vacation as part of JAFI's "Israel Experience" program.

Hillel is also seeing the highest number of U.S. college students coming to Israel since the start of the intifadah.

"We are at maximum capacity," said Wayne Firestone, executive director of the Israel on Campus Coalition, an umbrella group for 30 U.S. Jewish organizations founded by Hillel International and the Schusterman Foundation.

He said the easing of the security situation has made it easier for people to come to Israel and has also facilitated travel within Israel.

"Parents seem more comfortable and have made less problems about sending their kids," he said.

Surveying the Hadassah trips to Israel, which include two family missions and a singles group, Post said she was struck by the increase in both people travelling with their children and in first-time visitors, something not much seen in recent years.

"I think there is this window of opportunity and people see it and are positive about it," Post said.

During the previous intifadah years, most of the Jews coming to Israel were devoted Zionists.

"Now you have people on the fringes who are not necessarily as identifiable as passionate Zionists but came because they feel safer and see stability in Israel's government and America's government," she said.

Filmmaker to chronicle golden era of Jewish prizefighters

By LISA LOGAN
Special to The CJN

There was a time when one-third of all world champion boxers were Jewish, and there were literally thousands of professional Jewish pugilists engaging in fisticuffs from North America to Europe.

This golden era from 1900 to 1940 is a big part of the sport's history, and, incredibly, the story has yet to be told. Myself and partner Lon Appleby are currently developing a definitive documentary film about this incredible time when Jews dominated boxing. There were Jewish trainers, writers, announcers, promoters and, most significantly, boxers who are credited with inventing many of the sport's enduring techniques and trends.

I recently visited the first ever large-scale exhibit mounted on the subject at the National Museum of American Jewish History (www.nmajh.org) in downtown Philadelphia. It seems that people are now starting to realize that this was not some obscure period in history, but a phenomenon in which Jews won 28 World Champion boxing titles. No less than Mike Tyson's trainer Cus D'Amato has said, "There was no tougher fighter than a Jew."

While most people are surprised to hear about this era, they are also curious, because how often do they hear about "tough Jews?" The more I talked boxing and Jews, I found out that not only did I have a relative (my grandfather's brother) who was a boxer in London, England, but many Jews have fathers, grandfathers and uncles who were prizefighters.

Ted "Kid" Lewis

When hundreds of thousands of poor Jewish families were living in hard conditions on the Lower East Side in New York and Whitechapel in London, you often had to fight to survive and get ahead. Professional fighters Benjamin Leiner, Barnet Rosofsky and Gershon Mendeloff were all champions, but they were better known as Benny Leonard, Barney Ross and Ted "Kid" Lewis, since many changed their names so their mothers wouldn't find out they were boxing.

According to Peter Levine's Ellis Island to Ebbets Field: Sports and the American Jewish Experience, when lightweight champion Benny Leonard (1917–1925) took on "Irish" Eddie Finnegan in a western coal mining town, cries from the crowd urging Finnegan to "kill the kike" or "murder the Yid" enraged Leonard, who began pummeling Finnegan. Holding on for dear life, Finnegan grabbed Leonard in a clinch and pleaded for mercy, gasping in Yiddish that his real name was Seymour Rosenbaum.

These Jews boxed because they could make more money in one night than their parents did all week at a factory job. The once-desperate and hungry young men of these ghettos became legitimate boxing heroes of their communities. Benny Leonard, "Battling" Levinsky, Abe Attell, and other famous boxers were heroes to young people, and they helped Jews gain acceptance and respect in the society of that time.

Most lived in the United States, but Jewish boxers also came out of Canada. Maxie Berger from Montreal won the Canadian lightweight title in 1937, Benny May from Montreal was called "The Fighting Rabbi" and Sammy Luftspring from Toronto turned professional in 1936 and held the welterweight title for two years.

Leonard was not just the most famous Jew in America during his record 7½-year title reign, but he was considered by many to be the greatest pound for pound titleholder of all time.

Many Jews were innovators in the field. Nat Fleischer was the original publisher of The Ring magazine (the bible of boxing). The Everlast company, the largest manufacturer of boxing apparel and equipment, was started by Jacob Golomb in 1910. And Lou Stillman was the owner of the world-famous, and most popular, boxing gym, Stillman's in New York City.

In November, I made the trip to the Philadelphia museum for the opening of the "Sting Like a Maccabee" exhibit, where I met boxing historians, enthusiasts, writers, and a few surviving fighters from the era. Speeches were given in the museum's synagogue by guest curator Michael Silver, a boxing historian and journalist, and by others who helped make the show happen.

"This exhibition, in addition to telling the fascinating story of the Golden Age of Jewish boxers, also reveals how participation in boxing was part of the struggle to gain access and acceptance into the social and economic mainstream of America," Silver said.

"This was not obscure or a mutation. It is a big part of boxing history. It is so important, because they were so many [Jewish boxers]. The sport reached a height at that time," he said.

Trainer, ESPN commentator and former boxer Teddy Atlas also spoke at the opening. "Not only were they tough," he said, "but they had a lot to fight for, and a lot to prove. The Jewish boxers were able to dominate not just because of their left and rights. They had worth, they had character, they had things to overcome because of the prejudices they were faced with."

After reading Allen Bodner's When Boxing Was a Jewish Sport and Ken Blady's The Jewish Boxer's Hall Of Fame, New York painter Charles Miller became fascinated by the legendary Jewish fighters of the past and began to paint their portraits.

He originally looked to the museum to show his paintings, but officials there were immediately intrigued by the subject matter and decided to organize an entire exhibit on Jewish boxers from this era.

The exhibit can be found alongside his paintings of Ruby "The Jewel of the Ghetto" Goldstein and "Slapsie Maxie" Rosenbloom. They are among the portraits who appear in bold fighting postures, with the ever-present Star of David embroidered on their trunks.

The exhibit is filled with photos, memorabilia and films that curator Silver gathered over many months of research, phone calls and meetings with museums, boxing collectors, and family members of former champions and trainers.

Wonderful vintage, well-worn items such as gloves, a robe, a champion's belt, books and magazines help to re-create the excitement of the era in which ghettoized Jews became big winners.

Families and collectors were eager to share their memorabilia and stories and contribute to telling the history of Jewish fighters. I am hoping for similar feedback in our quest to bring film audiences an authentic and definitive story of this era. If any readers have information that can lead us to films of fighters, photos, memorabilia, or great stories please contact us at lisalogan@sympatico.ca.

Sting Like a Maccabee: The Golden Age of the American Jewish Boxer, will run at the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia until April 2005.

Baseball book collector Morry Liebovitz remembered

ST. MARYS, Ont. — Baseball book collector, author and mathematician Morris Jack Liebovitz died in Toronto on Dec. 14 after a battle with acute leukemia.

Obituary

Liebovitz was known in baseball circles for his collection of 3,000 books of baseball fiction. His entire collection, the largest of its kind in the world, valued in excess of $300,000, was donated to the Canadian Baseball Hall of Fame & Museum in stages over the past four years. Liebovitz felt this would be the best place to share his love for the game of baseball.

He was also strongly supportive of the hall's youth initiatives, particularly the Kids On Deck program, which consists of week-long summer camps in which baseball is used as a medium to plant seeds of cultural awareness in boys and girls, the museum said in a news release.

"I once bumped into Morry in the [Air Canada Centre] concourse during the third period of a [Toronto Maple] Leafs game," recalled Canadian Baseball Hall of Fame & Museum president and CEO Tom Valcke. "After he updated me on every one of his grandchildren, which always came first, we got talking baseball. Needless to say, the ACC was almost empty before our conversation ended, and the game even went to overtime. He bled baseball."

Liebovitz had a rare passion for baseball that led to annual trips where he would visit as many as a dozen minor league parks.

"There wasn't a bookstore in sight that he didn't visit," recalled his close friend, Larry Goldhar. "For 20 years, Morry was forever looking to add to his rare collection of first editions in baseball fiction.

"The day before Morry died, he was asking about the latest Blue Jays transactions," added Goldhar.

"Morry was approaching 70, yet he still brought his baseball glove to every ball game," recalled Valcke. "Finally, he caught a Yankees foul ball at SkyDome this past summer. He might as well have won the lottery."

"We are going to miss Morry's friendship and while his legacy will live on through his collection, it is his passion for baseball that will live on in anybody whoever had the privilege of hearing about what the game meant to him," Valcke added.

Liebovitz, who was once Canada's youngest university dean of mathematics at the age of 21, wrote seven math textbooks and was the former executive-director of the International Mathematics Olympiad.

He was a man of eclectic interests, ranging from mathematics to literature to country music and the U.S. Civil War.

Liebovitz was husband to Lorraine, father and father-in-law to Eric and Maureen, and Paul and Joy, and zaida to Michael, David, Lara, Jason and Jeffrey. He is also survived by his sister Adele.

Why wait? Eat the head first

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

During a rare day when I was escaping reality and watching television, a particular commercial captured my attention.

It began with a young boy dreaming about ice cream. He never ate ice cream before, but he knew what it was because his friends ate it. Sometimes they enjoyed a sundae and sometimes a flavoured scoop in a cone. He frequently had the opportunity to try it himself, but it was so alluring to him that he wanted to save it – possibly for a special day in the future.

The commercial continues with the boy growing up and becoming a young man. He passes up countless opportunities to taste the savoury treat. He thinks that perhaps one day in the future he will eat it. He gets married and has kids, but he just doesn't feel ready yet to try ice cream. He dreams about what it tastes like, and many more opportunities arise, but the commercial ends without him ever trying it. It fades to black and the announcer says, "What are you waiting for?" The symbol for an expensive car flashes on the screen.

I definitely can't afford the car, and I don't think we need to buy expensive automobiles to be fulfilled or happy in life, but I really loved the commercial, because I feel we can benefit from asking ourselves the question, "What are we waiting for?"

Are there things in our lives that we're saving for the future? Why not enjoy them now?

On a recent trip to the Caribbean, I met a young American woman who decided that she didn't want to wait any longer to follow her dream of living on the ocean. She left her old life behind, including a good full-time job, and took a huge risk to follow her dream.

When I asked her why she moved she replied, "Why should I wait until I am older and retired to live on the beach of my dreams when I can do it right now?" She told me she has never been happier and has no regrets.

We hear stories of people who have escaped near-death experiences and how it makes them appreciate their lives so much more. But why should it take a near-tragedy to make us appreciate life?

My boyfriend recently advised me to make every second on this earth count, because before we know it we'll be 90 years old. I don't want to have any regrets when it is my turn to leave. Sometimes, I stop myself from taking risks, partly because of fear or because I think there is still time in life to do things, but sometimes I do it because I just want to save something for a special occasion.

It reminds me of when I was little and my grandparents would buy me a gingerbread man for dessert. My favourite part was the head, because it was so cute and it tasted the best with the colourful icing sugar. But by the time I had gobbled down the body, arms and legs, I was too full to eat the head. So I saved it until it got stale, and then it was thrown in the garbage.

As an adult, I have finally figured it out – eat the head first!

Now I know how to enjoy dessert, but sometimes I need to be reminded to enjoy life. I want to travel the world, take risks, learn about other cultures and not let the experiences of past pain or betrayal in relationships stop me from loving those in my life right now.

As the famous saying goes, we should love like we've never been hurt, and dance like no one is watching.

Whether you believe in life after death or in reincarnation, we can all agree that life is short. We will be 90 before we know it, and I hope that when we get there, we won't have any regrets.

We really must eat more ice cream. So… what are you waiting for?

MUSHROOM & LEEK SOUP

1/2 cup butter or margarine
2 bundles leeks
1/2 lb. chopped mushrooms
1/4 cup flour
1 tsp. salt
dash cayenne pepper
1 cup vegetable broth
3 cups milk
1 tbsp. dry sherry (or lemon juice)

Wash leeks very well; slice and use white part only. In 1/4 cup butter/margarine, sauté leeks until tender, but not brown. Remove and set aside. Sauté mushrooms in same pan until soft – about 10 minutes. Blend in flour, salt and cayenne. Transfer to soup pot. Gradually stir in broth and milk. Cook, stirring until mixture thickens and comes to a boil. Add leeks, sherry, salt and pepper to taste. Simmer for 10 minutes. Serve with thin slices of lemon and a sprinkling of parsley if desired.

The miracle of Tiny and Tenacious

BY AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I can't say that I know God exists, but I live my life as though he or she does. Then, as often as an eclipse of the sun occurs, something with miraculous value comes along and propels me to a more steadfast belief in the Omnipotent.

Tinashe and Tinotenda, Zimbabwean twins who were born conjoined at the abdomen, are one such example.

Recently, Ve'ahavta, the organization I direct, partnered with the Herbie Fund of the Hospital for Sick Children and the Salvation Army to facilitate the transportation, accommodations and surgery required to separate the boys.

Tinashe and Tinotenda were delivered on July 20 in Zimbabwe by Dr. Rachel Spitzer, a fourth-year resident in obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Sinai Hospital who was volunteering at the Howard Hospital, a Ve'ahavta partner in sub-Saharan Africa. The twins are truly a wonder.

Astounded by the human phenomenon she had facilitated, Rachel set about the Herculean mission of dancing a complex humanitarian pas de deux that included securing buy-in from the Herbie Fund; partnerships with Ve'ahavta and the Salvation Army to assist with hospitality; and donations and volunteerism from synagogues and other organizations to assist in the many nuances of such an undertaking.

On Dec. 2, a warm winter morning in Toronto, two of God's special creations – the twins – arrived at Lester B. Pearson International Airport with their mother, Elizabeth, and their nurse, Grace.

A battery of tests, financed by the Herbie Fund, commenced immediately to determine whether the twins could be separated. Meanwhile, the Jewish community fell into its role of welcoming the visitors – hachnasat orchim.

More than a dozen Jewish volunteers, along with representatives from the Salvation Army, began visiting the family regularly, welcoming them into their homes and introducing them to their very first snowfall. B'nai Brith Lodges and other private donours contributed more than $10,000 to the "Ve'ahavta Twins Fund."

Ve'ahavta has dedicated a full-time staff member, Sarah Zelcer, to assist in co-ordinating the logistics, as well as to welcome and ensure home hospitality for Elizabeth and Grace. Currently, Grace is staying with Lorne and Dena Vineberg, whose daughter, Bekkie, is a Ve'ahavta intern at the Howard Hospital for the next seven months.

The family is also experiencing the beautiful Jewish hospitality of Rachel Spitzer's mother, Faye, who has taken them shopping and baked them tuna casserole – a dish that would not normally be in their sub-Saharan African diet.

"The world seems much smaller as I witness the kind of community support Jews and non-Jews are giving to this lovely family," Sarah said. "[Elizabeth, Grace and the twins] are already like family to us."

This is the third partnership Ve'ahavta has shared with the Herbie Fund. Two year ago, Ve'ahavta and Sick Kids helped Leanna Garraway, a heart surgery patient from Guyana who was diagnosed by our medical team in 2000.

Today, thank God, Leanna is a healthy and thriving 11-year-old.

The story of Tiny and Tenacious is about the miracle of birth and the miracle of modern medicine. It is also one of metaphysical, sea-splitting surprise, which springs forth when our life is perilously close to becoming predictable. As well, it's a testimony to a responsible community and to individuals who chose to help two tiny conjoined creatures of God who come from a dark continent thousands of miles from the Jewish hubbub of Bathurst Street.

We all pray for a successful operation, and that the twins will live long, healthy – and separate – lives together. For more information, visit www.veahavta.org.

You've made the commitment for the New Year, now we'll help you get there with expert advice, brand name equipment you can try before you buy and the guaranteed lowest prices in North America.

Abbas faces complex challenges

Internal PA politics pose major problem

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Mahmoud Abbas, who declared victory in the race for the presidency of the Palestinian Authority on Sunday, wore a bandage on his finger during the election campaign.

Abbas was injured in a work accident: as he waved through his car window to cheering crowds during an election stop, a security guard mistakenly pushed a button and the electric window went up, catching his finger.

It was a minor price to pay for a campaign in which many had feared for Abbas' head, not his fingers – and his finger injury is nothing next to the headaches he will face after Sunday's election.

Abbas' internal challenges are just as menacing as his fragile relations with Israel.

For one, he has limited powers: Abbas begins his career as Palestinian Authority president with a limited budget and many internal rivals waiting for him to fail.

Palestinian society is torn among conflicting currents – religious and secular, left and right, internal splits within each political camp and too many local chieftains focused on their own limited interests.

Analysis

"The burden on his shoulders is rather heavy," Faisal Horani, a Palestinian writer, said in an interview with Ha'aretz, "but under the Israeli occupation, he does not have the necessary tools to cope with the responsibility."

"I already feel sorry for him," said Nazmi Al-Juabi, a history professor at Bir-Zeit University in the West Bank and one of the signatories of the "Geneva Accord," an informal peace proposal formulated in 2003 by Israeli and Palestinian public figures.

Abbas will need to transform himself into a national leader. Given the heritage of his predecessor, Yasser Arafat, that's no easy task.

More than one in eight Canadian Jews live in poverty: UIA Federations study

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Even though the increase in the number of Jewish poor in Canada slowed "significantly" between 1991 and 2001, more than one in eight Canadian Jews – or nearly 50,000 people – live in poverty, says a new community study.

There are more than 9,000 Jewish children and more than 12,000 Jewish senior citizens in this country who are poor, states the report by UIA Federations Canada, part 4 of a series of demographic analyses of the Jewish community based on the 2001 census.

Nearly 50,000 people

Though the report paints a disturbing picture of Jewish poverty, it goes some way toward exploding the stereotype that all Jews are rich. The Jewish poverty level "strongly contradicts preconceptions held by both Jews and non-Jews regarding the universal affluence of Jews in our society," say the report's authors, Charles Shahar and Susan Karpman of Montreal.

"We certainly see it," Ron Levin, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) in Toronto, said of the number of Jews in poverty. "Our caseload is significant."

Yet, the report also notes that the poverty level among Jews is slightly lower than in the wider population, at 13.4 per cent compared to just over 16 per cent among Canadians in general, while the overall poverty rate is 19 per cent among all children up to age 14, versus 12.6 per cent in the Jewish community.

The News in Brief

Minister Visits Israel

OTTAWA — Carolyn Bennett, minister of state for public health, and David Butler-Jones, Canada's chief public health officer, led a government delegation to Israel last week to examine its disaster response system and possible applications to Canada's health emergency and disaster preparedness. The delegation was to meet with emergency and public health officials, and Bennett was expected to hold a bilateral meeting with Israeli Health Minister Dan Naveh.

WORLD

Israeli Aid OK: Gov't

COLOMBO — Sri Lanka denies it refused Israeli aid for tsunami victims. In a statement, the government said it delayed the arrival of the 150-member Israeli rescue and relief team because it couldn't accommodate team members and because it already had enough people on the ground. It stressed that Israeli food and medical supplies were accepted, and noted the "friendly and close diplomatic relations" between the counties. Initial reports said the team was rejected because it included military personnel, which might offend Sri Lankan Muslims.

City Honours Arafat

SAO PAULO — The mayor of an eastern Brazilian city dedicated a statue of Yasser Arafat. The mayor of Paraiba do Sul, Rogerio Onofre, inaugurated the statue of the late Palestinian Authority president on Dec. 31, saying the 39,000-person eastern Brazilian municipality received death threats and 300 e-mails protesting the monument. But the mayor said, "[It] defends peace. Some say Arafat was a terrorist. But if we analyze the matter, we'll see that also [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon is a terrorist. If someday he reached peace with the Palestinians, I'll defend a statue of him as well." The statue is part of an open-air memorial that includes a map and a Palestinian flag.

Spitzer Probing WJC

NEW YORK — New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, has launched a preliminary inquiry into allegations the World Jewish Congress mishandled its finances. In a statement, the WJC promised to cooperate with the informal probe. WJC officials have said issues of financial transparency, which have roiled the group recently, will be laid to rest at a meeting this week in Brussels, where Stephen Herbits is expected to be named secretary-general and WJC president Edgar Bronfman is expected to be re-elected.

Artie Shaw Dead at 94

LOS ANGELES — Artie Shaw, a top big band leader and clarinettist, died Dec. 30 at his home near Los Angeles at 94. Born Arthur Jacob Arshawsky on New York's Lower East Side to Jewish immigrant dressmakers, he enjoyed worldwide popularity from the 1930s to the mid-50s. Shaw – whose eight marriages, including to actors Lana Turner and Ava Gardner, all ended in divorce – once said he was a shy youth who experienced anti-Semitism in New Haven, Conn., when his family moved there.

Comics Pioneer Dies

MIAMI — Comic book industry legend Will Eisner died Jan. 3 in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., at 87. In the 1940s, he wrote and drew The Spirit, an influential work in the industry, whose awards are named for him. Eisner also pioneered the graphic novel, a form later used by Art Spiegelman in Maus. Eisner's first such work, Contract With God, explores U.S. Jewish immigrant life in the early 20th century.

Group Gets Rabbi

LIMA — An "emerging Jewish" community in Trujillo, Peru, now has a rabbi and Jewish teacher, courtesy of the Israel-based Shavei Israel group. The community formed in the mid-1960s, when a few hundred Catholics decided to live as Jews. Some 300 members already live in Israel.

Low Marks for Israel

LONDON — British newspaper readers ranked Israel as the country least deserving of international respect. It placed in the bottom five of 24 countries based on various standards of desirability in last week's survey in the Daily Telegraph. Meanwhile, a European Commission poll omitted a question that resulted last year in Israel being ranked as the world's greatest threat to peace. The question was left off this year's poll in part to avoid a repeat confrontation between the European community and Israeli and world Jewish leaders, the Financial Times reported.

Jewish Friend for Christian Claymation Stars

Davey and Goliath

CHICAGO — Davey and Goliath, the claymation characters from the 1960s- and 1970s-era Christian TV show of the same name, returned to TV last month in a new Christmas adventure and with new friends – a Jewish boy named Sam and a Muslim girl named Yasmeen.

Davey and Goliath's Snowboard Christmas, a one-hour special from the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA), was broadcast Dec. 19 and 26 on the Hallmark Channel in the United States. It was the first new Davey and Goliath production in 30 years. In the show – which, like the original series, soft-pedals messages of tolerance and respect – Davey compares holiday traditions with Sam and Yasmeen.

The series starred the trouble-prone Davey Hansen and his talking dog and conscience, Goliath. The 15-minute segments were provided free to TV stations by the liberal ELCA.

The special was made by Joe Clokey, the son of Ruth and Art Clokey, who made the original series. Art also created the claymation character Gumby.

Community mobilizes for tsunami relief

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish response to last month's tsunami disaster in South Asia has mirrored the international outpouring of concern and financial aid.

By this week, donations made through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto are expected to surpass $500,000, spokesperson Dan Horowitz said.

About 60 per cent of that amount has come through the federation's website, www.jewishtoronto.com, while the rest came mostly by telephone. "The phones haven't stopped ringing all week," Horowitz said.

B'nai Brith Canada, which originally said it was not planning its own fundraising drive, last week established the B'nai Brith Disaster Relief fund. Donations can be made over the phone, 416-633-6224, online by credit card at www.bnaibrith.ca or by mail, with cheques payable to B'nai Brith Foundation Disaster Relief Fund at 15 Hove St., Toronto, M3H 4Y8.

As well, everything collected in the organization's clothing bins during January will go to tsunami relief efforts.

By Jan. 6, international pledges for Southeast Asia had reached nearly $4 billion (US). Canadians have pledged more than $70 million, and the federal government has said it will match private donations dollar for dollar.

Sarah Zelcer, who is co-ordinating the response of Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, said the organization raised $30,000 in the first week of January. Some of the money is being sent to the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief, the arm of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) that is serving as the clearinghouse for the North American Jewish response to the tragedy.

HESCHEL KIDS FUNDRAISE FOR TSUNAMI VICTIMS: Three Grade 6 students at the Toronto Heschel School held a jelly bean contest last week for the Canada Kids Earthquake Challenge campaign, part of UNICEF Canada's Indian Ocean Earthquake Appeal. It was one of a number of such initiatives by Heschel students. More than $150 was raised for children affected by the Dec. 26 disaster from students who paid to guess the number of jelly beans in a jar. From left, Taylor Silverberg, Lindsay Cohen and Cydney Roth display a contest poster and the jar of jelly beans.

'Newer' sites to see in Israel

From the editor's desk

When stretched from top to bottom, Israel fits snugly between Toronto and Montreal. The country can be traversed by car in one day, and by plane in the time it might take someone to eat a corned beef sandwich with mustard and a slice of dill pickle on double rye.

Yet, despite its modest size, the tiny Jewish state is a magical checkerboard of constantly contrasting topographies, climates, flora, fauna, ethnic populations, religious sites and historical reference points.

As most visitors to Israel will attest, there is a great deal to see and do there. From one visit to the next, the experiences multiply, the pleasures expand and the feelings of personal and historic connectedness deepen.

Though it is a land with countless ancient stories sinewed into its very soil and stone, they are constantly renewing even as we hear them, see them or "touch" them for the thousandth time.

But there are also many newer "stories" in the young, dynamic Jewish state. To experience some of them was one of my objectives when I spent five days in Israel recently as the guest of the Ministry of Tourism.

Over the next few issues, I will write about some of those newer "stories," exciting sites and places to be experienced by the "veteran" Israeli visitor.

Some 21 years ago, on Sept. 15, 1983, Menachem Begin resigned as Israel's prime minister. Weary from the his long, hard years as one of Israel's great leaders – perhaps in particular, from the weight of the loss of life from the war in south Lebanon – the 70-year-old warrior statesman told his confidants "eineni yachol od," simply, "I can no longer."

Nine years later on March 9, 1992, at the age of 79, Begin died. He was buried on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem in "a simple Jewish burial" in accordance with the instructions he had recorded in his will.

The ceremony surrounding his interment symbolized the nature of the man – principled, humble and rooted in the traditions of his people.

Few today are the leaders, on any continent, who have the strength of character, breadth of knowledge and steel-hard courage of Menachem Begin. He was part of Israel's founding generation whose iron mettle was forged in the furnaces of Nazi Europe and whose laser-like vision was locked immovably onto the far-off lighthouse beam of Jewish statehood and independence. He was one of the men and women to whom subsequent generations will always owe an irredeemable debt.

Now there is a special place in Jerusalem where members of those subsequent generations will be able to visit to learn more about the man, the history through which he lived and which he helped shape, and the uniqueness of his legacy.

The Menachem Begin Heritage Center officially opened to the public last summer. It is a splendid monument to the wise collaboration between the people of Israel and the Diaspora. Built pursuant to a statute of the Knesset enacted five years after Begin's death, the $17 million (US) cost of construction came from overseas donors, many of them from Canada. The annual maintenance and operating funds will come from the state's budget.

Modelled somewhat on the concept of American presidential libraries, this is only the third such centre of tribute to an Israeli leader of government, along with one honouring David Ben-Gurion in Sde Boker in the Negev and a centre currently being built to the memory and legacy of Yitzhak Rabin in Tel Aviv.

Menachem Begin Heritage Center

The building is architecturally stunning. Built into the ridge of the Hinnom Valley, it is situated where central and southern Jerusalem met near the junctures of the Emek Refaim, Beit Lechem and Hebron roads. The view from the rotunda is a breathtaking panorama, onto the walls of the Old City towards the northeast, of stunning historic geography.

The visual core of the centre is a moving, interactive, multimedia, high-tech telling of the story of the life and times of Menachem Begin: from his beginnings in Europe, his life in the pre-state underground, as the leader of the Opposition and then as leader of the government. None of the controversies of his life – the King David Hotel bombing, the Altalena affair, the war in Lebanon – is avoided. Nor is any one of the celebrations: the founding of the state, the first Likud election victory and the signing of the peace treaty with Egypt.

But there is a great deal more to the centre's mandate. It includes an archives, a museum, an educational unit and a research unit.

Herzl Makov, the centre's executive director, told The CJN that part of the museum's key purpose is to try to strengthen the institutions of democracy by "looking at a type of leader who was dedicated to values and principles, who made decisions not according to the most recent poll. It is extremely important to bring back some of Begin's issues – concern for the rule of law and social justice – to the public agenda of Israel."

Next week, more stops on the itinerary. — MBD

TSUNAMI RELIEF:

Student council leaders and staff of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus, mobilized quickly to launch a $5,000 campaign in support of the victims and survivors of the tsunami disaster. CHAT's Tanenbaum campus has launched a similar project.

B'nai Brith joins community relief efforts

Ve'ahavta is devoting the bulk of its funds to helping Israeli efforts in the affected areas.

Zelcer said that "Israeli NGO personnel have been on the ground since the second day. They have established mobile medical clinics and feeding stations, but most of the press has ignored that, and people don't know about it."

Ve'ahavta is still looking into the possibility of sending personnel to the area.

Federations across the country have established their own funds, including those in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Hamilton, and Montreal.

In a statement, the JDC noted that besides the rising death toll – which at press time stood at more than 150,000 – five million people remain homeless, close to two million are hungry, and tens of thousands remain at high risk for diseases such as cholera, typhoid and malaria. The World Health Organization is predicting 50,000 additional deaths.

So far, the JDC has raised more than $2 million through phone and Internet contributions. It has also shipped more than $300,000 worth of medicine to India, and has announced the first in a series of allocations to its partner organizations on the ground. As well, it is examining the possibility of taking on infrastructure rebuilding projects at schools, hospitals and medical clinics.

The JDC has also dispatched a team of experts to Sri Lanka "to determine which critical areas of need are not being serviced adequately" and to select a partner agency on the ground to work with.

Reports continue to come in about the effects of the tsunami and problems affecting relief efforts. Because many roads have been destroyed, relief materiel is stuck in airport warehouses, some of it being destroyed or stolen. Efforts are being made to better co-ordinate foreign aid workers and the distribution of food, water and medical care.

At press time, aid officials were asking for donations of money rather than goods, for greater efficiency in coping with the needs of affected populations.

Legitimate aid organizations are also urging people to check the credentials of anyone asking for money or goods for Southeast Asia after reports surfaced about sham fundraising schemes.The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education in Toronto has posted suggestions on its website about how to teach students about the tsunami and tzedakah. Included are articles and discussion subjects on tsunamis and disaster relief.

No Israel divestment 'at this time,' Anglicans say

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The Anglican Church of Canada has "no intention at this time" of exploring divestment in Israel, the church's national leader has assured Canadian Jewish Congress.

In a recent letter to CJC president Ed Morgan, Primate Andrew Hutchison said his church will not look at the issue for the time being.

Hutchison also noted that a controversial statement issued in Jerusalem last September by the worldwide Anglican Peace and Justice Network (APJN) does not reflect the views of the Canadian church.

It was widely reported last autumn that the statement, titled Give Sight to the Blind and Freedom to the Captives, which was about the broader Israeli-Palestinian conflict, urged the church's decision-making bodies to explore financial divestment from Israel, similar to the policy adopted by the Presbyterian Church in the United States last summer.

However, Anglican and Jewish officials say the statement never urged divestment. The issue was fanned by the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz after some members of the network floated the idea in independent interviews.

Even so, the statement "is not the statement of the Anglican Church of Canada," Hutchison wrote to CJC.

He said the document will be brought to the Anglican Consultative Council for consideration when it meets in England in June. "They will decide whether or not to receive it, and whether or not to recommend it to the 38 provinces of the Anglican Communion, of which Canada is one," the primate noted.

Hutchison explained that the signature of the Canadian delegate to the APJN – whom Hutchison appointed – simply "affirms" that the statement "is consistent with the historic thinking and policies" of the Anglican Church of Canada.

He said the Canadian church, with its two million members, has "consistently defended the right of both Israel and Palestine to exist as secure and sovereign states, and [has] deplored the use of violence by the Israel Defence Forces and Palestinian militias, particularly where it destroys civilian life and community."

He added that his church has also consistently called for an end to Israel's "illegal occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, for its approval of settlements in Palestinian territories and the appropriation of arable Palestinian land."

As well, he said, the church has called "time and again" for negotiated peace based on the post-1967 United Nations resolutions 242 and 338.

Criticizing Israel's policies "in no way implies prejudice against Jewish people," he said.

In its response, CJC said it was "gratified" at Hutchison's stand on divestment, but that it remains hopeful that the Canadian church will "at no time" support divestment.

CJC's letter, signed by Morgan and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who chairs Congress' inter-religious affairs committee, called the APJN statement "a polemic containing factual and historical errors and prejudicial analysis of a complicated situation."

CJC also took Hutchison to task, saying his calls to end Israel's "illegal" occupation run counter to his stated support for a negotiated peace based on the UN resolutions he mentioned.

Congress expressed its concerns over the Anglican position at a meeting last November of the Canadian Christian Jewish Consultation, an interfaith dialogue in which CJC suspended participation in 2003 after Anglican leaders who had returned from a trip to the Middle East made pointed criticisms of Israel.

While Congress said it appreciates Hutchison's stand, its concerns "go beyond" the September statement and "focus on the longstanding positions of the Anglican Church of Canada on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

ChristianityToday.com then reported that Canadian Anglicans are "cautiously" considering divestment.

Victor Goldbloom, chair of CJC's national executive, told The CJN that the Anglican statement last autumn did not call for divestment.

However, the overall attitude of the Canadian church toward the Mideast "has been unbalanced and negative with regard to Israel," Goldbloom said.

Goldbloom met one-on-one with Hutchison in November, and "we have confidence that to the extent he's able to have an impact on Anglican policy, it will be positive."

CJC, he said, had hoped for a "more explicit" letter from Hutchison. "We would have been happier if those three words – 'at this time' – had not been there."

After Arafat, Abbas

Mahmoud Abbas achieved on Sunday what he so fervently wanted: governmental legitimacy. A large majority of Palestinians – some two-thirds of eligible voters – selected him to be the next president of the Palestinian Authority, replacing the deceased first president, Yasser Arafat.

But the larger question remains: have the Palestinians achieved what they so fervently need – a leader who will set a new course for them who has as his goal not the destruction of the sovereign Jewish State of Israel but the building of the sovereign neighbouring State of Palestine?

The entire world, especially Israel, will be watching him now, assessing his behaviour over the next short while to see who Mahmoud Abbas really is and what his true intentions really are.

If to judge him by his campaign rhetoric – that he would never surrender the Palestinian refugees' right of return, referring to Israel as the "Zionist enemy" and embracing the terrorist cells sworn to Israel's destruction – then he appears to be created in the image of his predecessor. As political commentator Danny Rubinstein reported in Ha'aretz, "He [Abbas] may wear a suit, he may not jump on tables or shout that a million martyrs will march to Jerusalem, but his demands from Israel are no different than Arafat's were."

But with the election over, we must judge him by his actions. They will need to be clear and decisive.

He must immediately take the necessary steps to build the institutions of a transparent, accountable, functioning democracy governed by the rule of law and not by the rule of a despot.

But even those steps will lead his people nowhere unless Abbas resolves first to meld the 14-or-so gangs of anarchic, gun-toting thugs into a bona fide, law-abiding, law-enforcing security force and he disarms and dismantles the terror networks of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Iranian surrogates trying to take root in the West Bank and Gaza, as he is required to do by the much-vaunted "road map" peace plan and as elementary nation-building demands of all putative governments. There can be no doubt, if Abbas does not destroy the terrorists, they will destroy him. It is an irrefutable certainty that all persons of good will intent on achieving peace between Israel and the Palestinians must impress upon him.

As Palestinians were voting on Sunday, Israel's Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom articulated his countrymen's hopes for the Palestinian elections: "I think that the leader who is elected will have to wage a genuine struggle against terror immediately and carry out reforms [in the PA]... Of course, we expect a new, different Palestinian leadership that will be prepared to move in the direction of peace."

The direction of peace is not hidden beneath thickly carpeted clouds or beyond a steep and craggy mountain terrain. It is within plain, open sight for all to see and for Palestinians to grasp.

If they only will it, it will be no dream for them.

Diatribe against human rights groups

At a time when Israel's global standing is plummeting and related anti-Semitism is on the rise, Israel needs a clear-eyed, candid assessment of the role played by its government's refusal in fighting terrorism to consistently comply with the requirements of international human rights and humanitarian law. Instead, Gerald Steinberg ("Human rights groups are working against peace," CJN, Dec. 9) offers a diatribe against human rights organizations that can charitably be described as pure fiction.

Steinberg makes the serious accusation that Human Rights Watch (HRW) "labels Israel as an 'apartheid regime' and Jews as 'imperialists' and 'colonialists.'" Yet, he cannot cite a single example in Human Rights Watch's 26-year history in which we have ever directed these terms at Israel or Jews.

Similarly, Steinberg accuses HRW of "whitewashing terror and condemning Israeli defensive actions." We have repeatedly and unequivocally denounced terrorism and fully support Israel's legitimate efforts to defend against it. We condemn only actions, whether taken in the name of counter-terrorism or not, that violate human rights.

Finally, Steinberg says that at the UN World Conference against Racism in Durban, HRW "joined hundreds of NGOs to promote the equating of Zionism with racism." HRW publicly denounced the final NGO document precisely because it contained such statements.

Jasmine Herlt

(Editor's note: Gerald Steinberg did not make an accusation that Human Rights Watch "labels Israel as an 'apartheid regime and Jews as 'imperialists' and 'colonialists.'" Rather, he explicitly wrote that the activities of HRW and other human rights NGOs "amplify the rhetoric that labels Israel as an 'apartheid regime' and Jews as 'imperialists' and 'colonialists.'")

Standards of halachic observance higher

Rabbi Dow Marmur celebrates "Post-halachic Judaism" (CJN, Dec. 23,) and, even more so, post-halachic Jews, for whom "Halachah has ceased to be normative, but for whom tradition matters," and who consequently are "respectful of Jewish law, yet heeding its precepts only selectively," and claims that "all movements in contemporary Judaism, except haredim, seem to be moving in that direction."

This claim is simply not true. Modern Orthodoxy over the last 30 years has moved in the direction of greater Torah study and, even more relevant, more scrupulous and consistent halachic observance.

The concealed premise of Rabbi Marmur's article is that halachic Judaism and modernity are ineluctably opposed. It follows, then – or ought to follow – that modern Jews will opt for post-halachic Judaism, and that only the anti-modern haredim will continue in significant numbers to view halachah as normative. That ever-growing numbers of young modern Orthodox Jews are adopting ever-higher standards of halachic observance does not fit into this picture, so Rabbi Marmur conveniently makes them disappear.

Challenge to Jewish leaders

I was dismayed to read that, once again, a group of ivory-tower Jewish academics have concluded that Jewish population growth is projected to be dangerously low ("Challenge to Jewish leaders," CJN, Dec. 16, 23).

It does not take an academic to understand that population growth comes from reproduction. Reproduction comes from marriage. Marriage results from successful relationships. Relationships are formed when compatible couples meet.

More than half the world's Jews are secular, but Jewish leaders seem unable to grasp the fact that most remain committed Jews. There is no institutional social network that enables non-observant Jewish singles over 25 to meet. I have spent the past five years appealing to Jewish leaders to address this issue, but have either been ignored or faced indifference.

Until Jewish leaders accept this reality, and take effective action, we can expect endless future studies similar to this one, and the inevitable demise of the Jewish people, as the world's population grows.

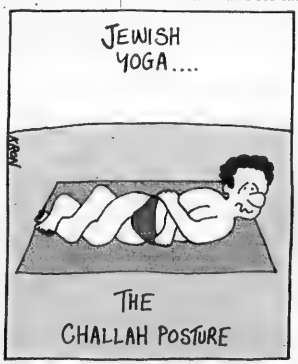
Jewish vegetarians

As a vegetarian for more than 25 years, and as someone who is married to a vegetarian and raising three healthy vegetarian children, I have to disagree with my colleague Rabbi David Bauman ("Judaism and vegetarianism," CJN, Jan. 6) on his rationales for eating meat. While it is halachically justified to eat it, it is not halachically mandated that we eat it.



Rabbi Bauman himself acknowledges that the ideal is vegetarianism, and that eating meat is a concession, heavily restricted and legislated. He did not give a single ethical reason to eat meat. The halachic system, which allows for eating meat, is also full of compassion for animals (tzaar baaley chayim). The same kashrut that leads us to say "no thank you" to pork and shellfish can also lead us to say "no thank you" to any slaughtered living thing. Why not actively bring the ideal closer to reality, rather than letting reality push away the ideal?

Perspectives

Prospect of army refusal looms

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As the scheduled start of Israel's Gaza withdrawal approaches, settler leaders are raising the specter of mass refusal by religious soldiers to carry out orders, and they're warning of disastrous consequences for the Israeli army and society as a whole.

But high-ranking Israel Defence Forces officers say settler leaders are exaggerating in an attempt to scare the government and to encourage soldiers to refuse to evacuate settlers from their homes.

Last Monday, the anticipated evacuation drama was played out in microcosm as soldiers and police dismantled the two mobile homes that made up the unauthorized West Bank outpost of Shalhevet Yitzhar. There were scenes of violent settler resistance, a call by a soldier to disobey orders and wide-scale arrests.

The refusal controversy has sparked a national debate, at the heart of which is the issue of state sovereignty versus rabbinical authority. The debate raises worrying questions: If there is widespread civil disobedience and refusal to carry out army orders, will Israeli society be dangerously divided? Could such a rift scuttle the withdrawal plan?

There have been cases of left-wingers advocating refusal to serve in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or to carry out missions in populated areas, but those calls for disobedience never approached critical mass. Last Sunday, however, settler leaders called a meeting with the IDF chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, to warn of an impending crisis.

The settler leaders said they themselves are against soldiers refusing to obey orders, but after rulings by settler rabbis excoriating Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's withdrawal plan and expressly forbidding soldiers to participate, thousands of religious soldiers probably would choose to obey their rabbis rather than their army commanders.

"The writing is on the wall," one settler leader was quoted as saying.

"The rabbis have spoken, and there is nothing we can do about it."

They said Sharon has only himself to blame for the situation, because he failed to build a wide national consensus for his plan. The fact that his policy lacks legitimacy in settler eyes only encourages refusal, and they want the army to help stop the erosion, the settler leaders said.

It wasn't clear just what they expected the army to do. In an earlier meeting with the IDF high command, Ya'alon made it plain that the army takes the refusal threat very seriously, but it has no intention of buckling in the face of pressure.

On the contrary, Ya'alon said the army's main challenge for 2005 is to make sure the withdrawal plan is carried out to the letter.

"As tough as it might be, we will have to be very firm, because failure to implement the decisions of the political echelon will put us as a nation and a society at risk," Ya'alon said.

Top IDF field commanders say they have encountered little evidence of impending mass refusal. Nevertheless, the army is calling for help from Israeli politicians. The generals say it's up to the political echelon to set the tone and create the conditions for tough action against settlers and soldiers who refuse orders.

Even that small outpost proved a handful to dismantle, and it went down only after an angry, three-hour skirmish.

Moreover, though one soldier did call on the others to disobey orders, there was no mass refusal. How will the army and police cope when large, bona fide settlements are uprooted – and if significant numbers of soldiers refuse to take part?

In the public debate, most speakers have come out strongly against refusal to obey orders. Indeed, some of the most outspoken critics are from the same national religious camp as the potential dissenters.

National religious Jews who make up most of the settler population, serve in the army and take strong right-wing positions face the most acute dilemma. On the one hand, they see settling the Land of Israel as a necessary step toward the coming of the Messiah, and they accept rabbinical rulings. On the other hand, they're loyal to the State of Israel and its institutions.

While the settlers tend to emphasize the primacy of rabbinical injunctions, other movement leaders and intellectuals elevate the authority of the state. For example, ex-general Yaacov Amidror, the first religious Jew to serve on the IDF general staff and one of the national religious movement's most articulate spokespeople against disengagement, makes a clear distinction between refusal by men in uniform – which he says is always illegitimate – and civil disobedience, which he condones.

In a democracy, Amidror says, it's totally unacceptable for army personnel to refuse to do the bidding of the government, to which they and the army are subordinate. Mass refusal, Amidror says, will pose a greater threat to the state than withdrawal – which, he believes, is itself a huge strategic blunder.

Similarly, Moshe Kaveh, president of Bar Ilan University, where the faculty and student body is made up mostly of national religious Jews, maintains that most of the religious Zionist movement is against refusal, and he urges the camp's leaders and rabbis to speak out strongly.

"All those who are against must speak out so that history will not judge them for remaining silent at such a crucial time for the state they helped to build," he declared in an Israel Radio interview.

Writing in Ma'ariv, journalist Bambi Sheleg, also a member of the national religious camp, came out strongly against the way many religious Jews subordinate their own judgment to that of the rabbis.

"Under the cloak of 'Torah ruling,' the smartest people suppress their independent views and their capacity to interpret reality as they see it," she wrote.

"To be an observant Jew, you don't need a rabbi to think for you. A rabbi can decide on matters of kashrut, Shabbat and excommunication. He cannot decide for us on questions of life and death, especially when they are national questions."

In Yediot Achronot, political scientist Shlomo Avineri developed the same argument. A secular, left-wing Jew, Avineri maintained that rabbis should not have any special say in matters of state because the Jewish religious law they rely on was developed for the Diaspora, not for conditions of national sovereignty.

"In matters of state, the halachah has nothing to say because it was developed – and that's its power and glory – at a time when the Israeli people did not have a state of their own," he wrote.

Criticism from the left reflected public impatience with the settlers. Labor Party legislator Ophir Pines-Paz accused settler leaders of hypocrisy for claiming to be against refusal but doing little to discourage it.

In fact, more and more pundits are calling on the government to set a final withdrawal date. After that, they say, settlers who decide to stay in their homes will have to fend for themselves, without IDF protection or government responsibility for their fate.

'If you want to protest, protest against me'

The following are excerpts from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's remarks last week during a meeting with Israel Defence Forces and police personnel who took part earlier this month in the evacuation of an illegal outpost near Yitzhar in the West Bank.

Ariel Sharon

"I asked to meet you today following the difficult scenes from the evacuation of the illegal outpost near Yitzhar. I have already received a report from your commanders regarding the action that you carried out and I want, first of all, to tell you, for myself and on behalf of the government, and, believe me, for the entire country, 'Thank you.'

I know the significance of your actions and their consequences. I know that you are engaged in a very difficult struggle, with many successes, against terrorism… I know that [evacuating the outpost] was not an easy mission. It wasn't the mission that you trained for. But this is the mission that you were charged with and it must be carried out for the security of all of the country's citizens, for all of us.

I must say that I saw and heard that you acted with restraint and equanimity. You bit your lips, but you carried out the mission. I heard the curses and insults and the incitement against the IDF, against the commanders, against the soldiers, against the police personnel. I ask you: Don't take it personally. It is not directed against you – it is directed against the government, against the Knesset and against me.

Whoever calls for harm to the IDF, the Israel Police and the security forces does a very serious thing with far-reaching consequences. I want to say to the inciters, the cursers and the revilers: Leave out the IDF. If you want to protest, protest against me. If you want to revile, revile me. Leave politics in the political arena and leave the IDF and its soldiers out of it. The IDF has always been at the heart of national agreement and there it must remain.

Today, whoever calls for refusal is destroying the most important thing to Israeli society. It is truly a crime against Israeli society. It is possible to evacuate a community, it is possible to rebuild. The IDF, the military of the Israeli people would be very difficult to rebuild.

The call to refusal can lead to a historic rift in the entire Jewish world, and not only in Israel. Whoever calls to refuse or to oppose with force and violence is wrong, mistaken and is endangering our very existence in this place. We must all avoid this at any price. And therefore, on this matter, there will be no compromise. Whoever raises his hand to a soldier or police officer or member of the security forces, whoever organizes refusal, whoever threatens, we will act against him forcefully…

It is important to me that you remember that we're talking about a small minority among the settlers. The settler public… is mostly made up of wonderful, law-abiding people… Protest must be respected, but you must act determinedly and assertively against those who cross the red lines.

It was important for me to come here today… in order for you to know that it is my government that is sending you on these missions. Our decisions were not made lightly, but now that they have been made, they obligate all of us. This is the meaning of a democratic state and Israel is a democratic and law-abiding state…

I hope that our assertive stand on this issue will enable you to… uphold your main missions in the struggle against terrorism without you being reviled and threatened. Don't let them hurt you. We will struggle against this phenomenon and we will not allow it to raise its head, not here, not anywhere.

There is a government that makes decisions and there is a Knesset that makes decisions, and these things must be carried out. In order to continue existing as a nation, there can be no attacks on any part of the security establishment. It cannot be that a minority will try to dictate and use violence in order to enforce its ideas, opinions and laws on the majority. They will not dictate their laws on the entire nation."

Lobbying for a 'Diaspora Knesset'

In February 2003, Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, began describing his idea of what he referred to as a "Second House" – an international forum that would function alongside the Knesset and assist in decision-making on a range of issues affecting the future of the Jewish people. A document outlining the founding principles of the proposed new body has since been released by Katsav's office, and last month the initiative was discussed at a special meeting of the Knesset's committee on immigration, absorption and the Diaspora.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Though specific details about the mandate and makeup of this parliamentary adjunct still need to be articulated, it seems, nonetheless, that the more general concepts of the president's plan are attracting attention both within Israeli government circles and also from among various Jewish organizations around the world.

The objective, we're told, is to establish a council of 120 members, half from the Diaspora and half from Israel. This entity would have only an advisory role, focusing on issues such as assimilation, Jewish education, strategies for countering anti-Semitism, the promotion of Zionism and Jewish culture and the relationship between Jews and other ethno-cultural groups. It would not operate as a legislative assembly nor have input into decisions relating to Israeli state interests, such as the economy, national security, Israeli-Arab interactions or evolving peace initiatives.

In principle, Katsav's proposal may have some merit, but its implementation – should it ever occur – promises to be enormously problematic. To begin with, there has not even been a decision on what the assembly should be called. Aside from "Second House," which has little appeal, the terms "Parliament of the Jewish People," "Congress of the Jewish People," and the "House of Israel" have all been suggested with varying degrees of enthusiasm, but without much hint of agreement.

Then there is the issue of fine-tuning the agenda of the new institution. How will its responsibilities differ from those of the Jewish Agency, for example, and how will duplication and potential turf warfare be avoided?

But, perhaps most importantly, who will serve on this yet-to-be-defined council? Will representation be by election or by appointment, and what allocations are envisaged by country or region? And what about the qualifications, expertise and experience of prospective council members? Will this merely place the "Jewish establishment" under a different umbrella, or will we see a new generation of activists, strategists and intellectuals as core players in the emerging order?

Katsav's vision may translate into a reality that has traction and relevance – or it may not. Meanwhile, the December meeting of the Knesset committee apparently drew to a close without any definitive plans to move forward.

Largely alone in our hour of need

You can feel that the deep freeze of Israel's isolation is quickly thawing. There is a palpable sense of hope and optimism in the air, as tourists are flocking back in ever-growing numbers and, more importantly, plucking up their courage to venture out into downtown Jerusalem to shop. In front of the hotels, tour buses and taxis are competing once again for parking space. Yasser Arafat, if you can believe it, is not sorely missed.

Ross Culliner in Jerusalem

I, too, am reaping the benefits of our improving fortunes. Business for tour guides is definitely looking up. And yet for some strange reason, I am finding it hard to get into the spirit of things. I see the cheerful Jewish tourists and am beset by oddly unpleasant sensations. After all that has happened here over the past four years, it's no simple matter – not for me anyway – to get back down to business as usual.

I simply can't erase from memory the sorrowful visions of empty, darkened hotels without a single guest, of desolate streets lined with bankrupt businesses and "for rent" signs, and of the shameful looks on the faces of many of my friends and colleagues, veteran tour guides and hotel employees, who were forced onto the dole or to labour at menial jobs in order to keep body, soul and family together.

Indeed, there was a critical period in late 2001 and early 2002 when desperation and despair were biting deep into our souls and our will. And at that pivotal juncture in the history of the State of Israel – indeed, in Jewish history in general – as the ground quaked beneath our feet and the lights flickered ominously, we Israelis found ourselves to be very much alone, as most of our so-called "Jewish family" kept a safe distance from our troubled land. I'd be a liar if I denied that it hurt.

There were, of course, numerous praiseworthy exceptions – solidarity missions and a host of other courageous expressions of support and backing at all organizational levels. But the conspicuous absence of the average Jewish tourist in our hour of real need, when our morale was flagging and our grief had reached dangerous heights, calls for a serious and honest re-examination of the validity and vitality of certain underlying assumptions of our collective Jewish experience and self-definition.

Are we, as the banners and placards outside the Jewish Agency buildings proudly proclaim, "One people with one destiny?" Do we "stand united?" Are we, in the final analysis, "one great family?" Or are these time-honoured fundraising slogans nothing but baseless promotional hype? Do we Israelis stand largely alone?

It was strikingly beautiful in Jerusalem on the day I wrote this column, autumnal and crisp in a Canadian way. Donning a warm woollen jacket, I headed out into the brisk morning for a walk. My mood was unusually upbeat as I went over in my mind the crowded guiding schedule of the next couple of weeks, recalling clearly how only one year earlier I had sat at home idle and without income.

But it was not long before I came crashing down with a very hard landing to planet Earth once again. My wanderings through the centre of town took me quite unintentionally, yet inevitably perhaps, past no fewer than four suicide bombing sites.

I halted briefly by each of them, recalling the details and circumstances of the particular incident. I recalled the faces of the victims that my family had personally known, people whose names were now etched in red on the memorial plaques – among them, some of my kids' school companions, the school janitor, the sister of my butcher, the son of my bank advisor, and one of my oldest boy's closest friends. I relived the grisly scenes of destruction and mutilation after the disasters and the heart-rending spectacles on TV of the unending funerals that followed.

During the living hell of these past four years, our society displayed a truly remarkable degree of courage and resilience – far greater than you can imagine. It was made all the more difficult by how lonely we felt, here at the far end of your world.

The Palestinian elections are an important step in the post-Arafat era, providing a basis for optimism for the first time in many years. The end of the late Palestinian Authority president's reign of terror has not led, at least so far, to the emergence of another dictator. The fears of civil war have remained theoretical – at least so far – and PLO leader Mahmoud Abbas ran a real campaign, even in the absence of serious opposition.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But it's much too early to declare the Palestinian experiment in democracy a success. For decades, Abbas was a core member of the PLO's "old guard," and his campaign reflected Arafat's powerful shadow. In election rallies, Abbas repeated the standard phrases on Palestinian refugees and Jerusalem that have blocked any compromise since the creation of Israel, and there was no debate on these core issues.

Nevertheless, there are differences in tone. Abbas and PA prime minister Ahmed Qureia sound and look pragmatic, and they don't embrace "martyrdom" and incitement. Although Abbas once promoted Holocaust denial, in the past two years, he has criticized Arafat's policy of violent confrontation, albeit for pragmatic rather than moral reasons. He repeated this point during the election, and in response, Hamas leaders ominously warned against deviating from the party line.

In response to this tentative opening, the Israeli government took measures to lower friction and to facilitate the emergence of a non-violent Palestinian leadership. Security forces stayed away from Palestinian cities and allowed local police forces to carry weapons for the first time since the beginning of Arafat's terror campaign. Despite the continuing infiltration attempts, dozens of checkpoints were removed in order to limit obstructions to the campaign and voting process. And, most importantly, preparations for the planned Israeli disengagement from Gaza were accelerated.

But the real test for Abbas and Qureia has yet to begin, and the potential for renewed terror and escalating violence remains high. In the election campaign, they repeatedly stated that they would not attempt to use force to disarm terror groups such as the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and Hamas. Efforts to launch attacks from cities in the West Bank areas of Judea and Samaria are continuing, and the success of Israeli security forces in intercepting them cannot be guaranteed. In Gaza, the effort to claim a "military victory" led Palestinian terror groups to increase the level of attacks, including the Dec. 12 explosion under an Israeli army outpost along the Egyptian border, in which all the soldiers inside were killed or injured.

If there is going to be significant movement toward peace, Abbas and Qureia will need to confront and disarm these terror groups without delay. The elections were supposed to provide the legitimacy for this, but many Palestinians will retain a cynical view of Arafat's former partners in corruption and dictatorship.

Furthermore, even after winning this election, Abbas and the other "Tunisians," – the group of Palestinians who spent many years living well with Arafat in Tunis and far away from Gaza, Ramallah and Jenin – are unlikely to display the charisma and political leadership necessary to escape from Arafat's shadow.

In contrast, Marwan Barghouti, who emerged from the intifadah of the late 1980s as the main alternative to Arafat's Tunisians, remains very popular. But Barghouti was convicted by an Israeli court on five counts of murder, and his brief candidacy in opposition to Abbas was primarily designed to publicize demands for the release of thousands of members of terror groups in Israeli jails. Barghouti bowed out of the contest in return for a pledge from Abbas to press this issue immediately after the election. Since Israelis are not going to agree to another terror wave, as occurred after the prisoner releases during the Oslo process, this demand will lead to major confrontations.

Thus, to lead Palestinian society away from Arafat's disastrous legacy, Abbas and Qureia face many difficult challenges. The elections provide an important beginning, but the substantive changes required in Palestinian society will take many years, even under the most optimistic scenarios. And if Canada and other well-meaning governments press Israel to take major risks before terror groups are disarmed, this will lead to another failure.

The Kirshner File

Letter from India

High up in Malabar Hill, one of Mumbai's most affluent residential neighbourhoods, an aphorism on a billboard attributed to that great Indian apostle of nonviolence, Mahatma Gandhi, caught my eye: "You cannot be a true Hindu if you hate another religion."

Sheldon Kirshner in Mumbai

Slogans, as I have learned, should be taken with a grain of salt. But in India, the world's largest democracy and a living laboratory for ethnic and religious diversity, this slogan rings true.

Historically, India – a largely Hindu sub-continent whose land mass includes alpine peaks and steamy jungles – has genuinely welcomed foreigners. Bahais, Sufi Muslims, Zoroastrians and Jews have each found refuge here. And four religions – Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism and Sikhism – have arisen in India. Islam was brought here in the 16th century by Mughal invaders, who left behind masterpieces of architecture, notably the sublime Taj Mahal in Agra and the majestic Humayun's Tomb in New Delhi. And Western colonial powers – from Portugal to Britain – introduced and disseminated Christianity to this nation of 1.1 billion, whose population is exceeded only by that of China.

India, having been an exemplary host to all these faiths, is rightly known for its "live-and-let-live" ethos. Yet India's record as a paragon of tolerance is hardly perfect. Since attaining independence in August 1947, less than a year before Israel's emergence as a sovereign state, India has been convulsed by several deadly episodes of ethnic violence.

The last such outburst took place in the winter of 2002, when Muslims and Hindus massacred each other in Gujarat. Such incidents, in the main, have pitted Hindus against Muslims, who comprise about 12 per cent of India's overall population and who generally practise a moderate form of Islam that would be alien in, say, Saudi Arabia.

These occasional killing sprees, ignited by political disputes, have tarnished India's image. But in the congested, frenetic cities of India, from Calcutta to Chennai (formerly Madras), Hindus and Muslims seem to mix freely and easily.

India's status as a melting pot of cultures and religions has been of immense benefit to Jews, whose uninterrupted presence here stretches back to antiquity, to King Solomon's time, but whose numbers have always been minuscule.

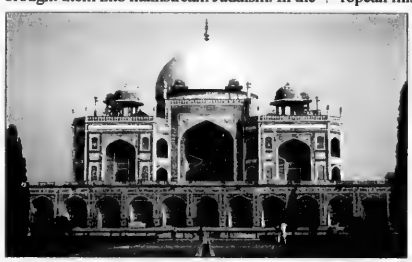
In the modern era, India was home to never more than about 30,000 Jews, concentrated in Mumbai (Bombay), the commercial capital and the centre of the Bollywood film industry. With the advent of Jewish statehood in 1948, many Jews immigrated to Israel. Still others settled in Britain, Canada and Australia. As a result, there are only some 5,000 in India today, constituting 0.000455 per cent of its population, a drop in an ocean. That humble figure is dropping due to emigration, part of which flows toward Israel.

Despite its Lilliputian size, Indian Jewry is anything but monolithic. In fact, there are three primary Jewish groups in India.

The Bene Israel, the majority of whom reside in and around Mumbai, are by far the biggest. Legend has it that their ancestors arrived prior to the destruction of the Second Temple.

For centuries, they were isolated from mainstream Jewry, and some mingled with the locals. These contacts led to caste-like divisions between so-called "white" and "black" Bene Israel. The basic difference turned on skin colour. "Black" Jews were those whose forebears had intermarried. "White" Jews were supposedly "pure."

During the 18th century, the Bene Israel came into contact with Cochin Jews, who brought them into mainstream Judaism. In the 19th century, the Bene Israel began moving to the cities. But to this day, some still live in villages fairly close to Mumbai.



Humayun's Tomb in New Delhi

The first Cochin Jews are said to have settled in Kerala, in southern India, during the biblical period. In the aftermath of the Spanish Inquisition, they were joined by Jews from Spain, Germany and Holland.

They, too, formed sub-communities, consisting of Malabaris, Pardesim and Meshuharim. At first, they were concentrated in two centres: Kudungallur – or Cranganore – and Anjuvannam. But in the early 16th century, after being attacked by the Portuguese and the Moors, the Jews settled in Cochin, a small palm-fringed island in the Arabian Sea just off the mainland.

The Baghdadi Jews, the last to arrive in India, initially appeared in the late 18th century, originating from the Middle East. The trickle turned into a stream with the arrival of David Sassoon, a wealthy merchant from Iraq, and his fellow Baghdadis in the first third of the 19th century. The Baghdadis tended to be staunchly pro-British and more socially insular than either the Bene Israel or the Cochin Jews.

In the eastern Indian states of Manipur and Mizoram, where many of the inhabitants are Christians, there are people of Chinese appearance who claim to be the descendants of one of the 10 lost tribes of Israel. Describing themselves as Jews, they say they were forced to adopt Christianity in the 19th century by European missionaries. Many rabbis do not recognize them as Jews, but according to recent DNA tests, they carry the same genes as Jews in Uzbekistan and India. In recent years, a handful have made aliyah after formally converting to Judaism.

Whatever their origin, Jews in India have been treated with respect by post-independence governments and have never been subjected to state anti-Semitism. India, along with China and the United States, is thus one of the few major countries in history that have not subjected their Jewish citizens to official discrimination. And in this tolerant climate, Jews have been able to flourish in a variety of trades and professions. Nissim Ezekiel was a poet and literary critic. Abu Abraham was a newspaper cartoonist. Helen and David were stars of Hindi movies. Hannah Sen was president of All India Women's Conference. Gen. Jack Jacob commanded Indian forces in the 1971 war against Pakistan.

These days, a large proportion of Jews are in the professions as doctors, lawyers and accountants, and in the booming computer sector as programmers, analysts and startup entrepreneurs. There are no fabulously wealthy Jewish business tycoons like the Tatas, Parsis (Indian Zoroastrians) who are known as the Rockefellers of India.

A "sign of the times" in Mumbai

Like China, with which it fought a border war in 1962, India is an up-and-coming power. Early last month, when I was in India at the invitation of its tourism board, the current Indian prime minister and the architect of its seminal 1990s economic reforms, Manmohan Singh, declared, "The 21st century will be the century of Asia and without doubt the century of India."

He may be right. India – a nuclear power that established formal diplomatic relations with Israel in 1992 – is expected to become a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council within the foreseeable future, and plans to launch an unmanned spaceship, Chandrayaan-1, on a moon mission in 2007 or 2008. So India, a land of sharp contrasts with a thriving middle class whose appetite for consumer goods seems boundless, is on something of a roll.

Yet most Indians, particularly in remote rural areas far from the gloss and glitter of Mumbai or New Delhi, remain mired in a kind of appalling Dickensian poverty that visitors always find shocking and depressing.

JACS works hard to accommodate growing client list

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Many of the estimated 20,000 Jewish drug addicts and alcoholics living in the Greater Toronto Area face a unique challenge in battling their disease. For them, the option of attending support meetings in a church basement simply doesn't exist.

That's one reason why JACS (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others) which recently became a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, is more in demand than ever before.

Established in 2000, JACS enables Jewish people of all ages and their families to recover from their disease in a safe and anonymous Jewish environment. JACS currently receives well over 200 calls a month and its Thursday night resource meetings can no longer accommodate the overflow. Since JACS opened, approximately 20,000 people have been through its doors.

"We do have a significant problem in our Jewish community with alcoholism and drug addiction, whether we admit it or not," says Marla Goldman, executive director of JACS. "We have the same problem as the community-at-large, in that about 10 per cent of our community – as in the general community – is affected. JACS provides the nurturing and safe Jewish environment these people need to recover properly. That's important because most Jews will not go into a church, and in terms of anonymity, synagogues don't work either."

While JACS connects its clients to the best addiction resources anywhere in the world, it remains unique due to its important connection to Judaism.

"We not only adhere to the 12 steps of recovery, but to the Torah, as well," says Goldman. "It's all about the path one takes, the choices they make, and living their lives according to Jewish values. So many of these people have rediscovered their Jewish roots through JACS. As much as JACS is about recovery, it's also about spirituality."

That's why once a month, a JACS volunteer hosts Shabbat dinner for its participants. UJA Federation also provided funding recently enabling JACS to purchase a sukkah.

"I've never been as frightened as I was when I first went through the doors of JACS, but also so relieved," says a mother and grandmother who went to JACS one year ago for her alcoholism, and who has been clean and sober since. "The support, kindness and care of the people here is incredible. It's a family here; you don't feel alone. I've learned so much about Judaism. There's definitely a connection between learning about Judaism and staying healthy. JACS is the best thing that ever happened to me."

"One of the reasons JACS receives funding from UJA Federation is because, as a community, we need to recognize and support the needs of the entire community," says Keith Ray, chair, social planning and allocations, UJA Federation. "JACS is an important resource for any community to make available to its citizens."

For more information, call JACS at 416.410.5227 (JACS) or visit the JACS website at www.jacstoronto.org.

Heirs of slave labourers seek compensation

Thanks to the efforts of Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST) – a department of UJA Federation – thousands of dollars in compensation should reach the Toronto heirs of deceased Holocaust survivors starting in mid-2005.

An estimated 30,000 application forms have been sent out worldwide through the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, better known as the Claims Conference, headquartered in New York. Compensation will be distributed to those who toiled as slave and/or forced labourers under the Nazis. The money will be taken from a 10 billion-deutschmark fund created by the German government.

In 2001, JIST helped close to 1,000 survivors complete their compensation forms. Since then, some of the survivors have passed away. Now their recognized heirs face the reality of their loss and the need to complete forms to ensure they receive the funds initially earmarked for their family members. JIST is helping heirs complete the application process.

"This was obviously a very difficult and emotional experience," said Frances Goldstein, who sent in a form based on her late father's initial claim.

"We're honoured to play a role in helping these people get what they, or what their relatives so richly deserve," said Barbara Barak, senior coordinator, JIST.

The deadline for initial applications was December 31, 2001, but recognized heirs have until April, 2005 to submit their forms.

For more information contact Barbara Barak or Fran Augenblick at JIST, 416-635-5600.

Participants on birthright israel give the gift of life

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Proving its ever-growing impact, birthright israel has begun its sixth year of operation with participants who traveled through the Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) - which organizes UJA Federation youth programs in Israel and abroad – registering as bone marrow donors to the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation.

On an earlier trip, Lorne Klemensberg, director of Israel programs for CIE, heard the personal story of Jay Feinberg, executive director and founder of Gift of Life and a bone marrow transplant recipient himself. A bone marrow transplant is, at times, the only successful procedure to combat leukemia.

"After hearing Jay's inspiring story, it donned on me that I have access to thousands of Canadian Jewish youth who come to Israel through the CIE birthright israel program," said Klemensberg. With support from Feinberg and birthright founders Charles and Andrea Bronfman, Klemensberg made a commitment to inform all participants about the importance of the Gift of Life registry and to inspire them to get tested. So far, the response has been very positive.

"Hundreds of young adults have been tested already, and with so many more participants still to come to Israel, the pool will only widen," added Klemensberg. "Joining the Gift of Life registry is a way for birthright israel participants to give back and show their appreciation for the gift they have been given," he explained.

For Elana Covshoff, 22, a student at University of Toronto and a CIE birthright israel participant, registering as a donor was a swift decision. "I didn't have to think about it. I thought even if I don't match, the idea of having a Jewish database of DNA is phenomenal – something that can be used for future research," she said, in an interview while still visiting Israel as part of the birthright program this winter.

birthright israel participants who registered as bone marrow donors to the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation, provide a swab of saliva for a Jewish database of DNA.

The test itself was a non-invasive procedure that involved a self-administered swab of saliva from the mouth. Klemensberg was on hand with this group to emphasize the Jewish significance of registering. "He told us that saving a person's life is an essential tenet of Judaism," Covshoff explained. As a result, the majority of the participants from the group registered.

UJA Tsunami Relief Fund surpasses $500,000

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Two weeks after its inception, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Tsunami Relief Fund has raised more than $500,000 from over 2,500 donors.

One hundred per cent of funds raised by UJA Federation will be sent to its overseas partner, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) and associated disaster relief agencies.

The JDC has, so far, allocated funds to:

- The International Rescue Committee for ongoing delivery of relief supplies in the hard-hit Aceh province of Indonesia.
- The Disaster Mitigation Institute and Caritas/ Catholic Relief for delivery of food, clothing and temporary shelter materials in Chennai, India. JDC operates a field office in Mumbai, and will work with the local Jewish community to coordinate activities in the field.
- The Chabad Lubavitch Organization to provide medical help, meals and clothing for injured survivors in Thailand. Chabad volunteers are working at hospitals, providing clothing and counseling services.

JDC is also looking at longer-term infrastructure rebuilding projects, such as schools, hospitals, orphanages or medical clinics.

"As soon as word of the disaster broke, we realized we would have to respond collectively as a Jewish community.," said Leslie Gales, chair of the board, UJA Federation. "Many of our UJA Federation staff and leadership were on vacation, but, despite that, we conference-called the next day with staff and leadership to put everything in motion immediately. We were in direct contact with the Joint Distribution Committee to determine the best use of the funds and, even though our offices were closed, staff came in to get our hotline and website ready for the community to respond. And the response has been beyond our expectation. The calls and emails poured in and website was buzzing. So many of the donors spoke with great pride that the Jewish community had stepped up to the plate immediately and with such generousity. And indeed they have."

Shimmy Wenner, UJA Federation's director of donor services, records yet another donation to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tsunami Relief Fund.

"The number of calls and interest from people has been amazing," said Zelmanovich. "A lot of people who called to donate – Jews and non-Jews alike – said they chose UJA because they knew the money would get to where it was needed. The phone just keeps ringing and ringing; but it's a great sound to hear."

"As a human being, my heart goes out to all of those who lost loved ones, their homes, everything really," said Michael Sue Goldblatt, one of the first donors to the UJA Tsunami Fund. "As a Jew, I thought it was important to give 'Jewishly,' because others should know that Jews care about others. That's why I donated through UJA."

"When I saw this tragedy on television, I was moved to donate by two things," said Ari Kaplan. "One, our general obligation as Jews to give to tzedakah, and two, a sensitivity, as a Jew, to those in despair suffering from disaster and tragedy."

Donations to the UJA Federation fund can be made by visiting the UJA website at www.jewishtoronto.com and by clicking the Tsunami icon, or by calling the UJA Tsunami Hotline at 416.631.5705. Cheques should be made out to the UJA Tsunami Disaster Relief Fund and mailed to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, 4600 Bathurst Street, M2R 3V2. Donations can also be made from across Canada and the United States by calling UJA Federation's toll free number–1-888-635 CHAI (2424).

JDC's century of relief assistance

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), a relief organization with nearly 100 years of experience and UJA Federation's overseas partner, is no stranger to providing assistance in devastating situation. Here' a brief look at just a few of the disaster relief efforts carried out by JDC over the last two decades.

Haiti/Dominican Republic: Flood Relief

In the wake of hurricanes that hit some of the poorest areas of Haiti and the Dominican Republic in the summer of 2004, JDC assisted other organizations in providing emergency supplies on a non-sectarian basis.

Turkey: Assistance to Terrorist Victims

On November 15, 2003, terrorist bombs destroyed Neve' Shalom and Beit Yisrael synagogues in Istanbul, Turkey. Less than one week later, Istanbul was again the site of terrorist violence. In total, 57 people were killed (four of whom were the terrorists) and over 700 were injured. JDC raised over $1 million to assist non-Jewish and Jewish victims of the attack.

Kosovo Relief and Assistance

Beginning in1999, when the Kosovars were forced to flee to neighboring countries, emergency supplies such as bedding and water containers were distributed in the refugee camps, shelters were opened in Albania, a medical clinic was established in Macedonia to aid refugees and host families, and emergency medical care was provided by volunteers from JDC's medical registry.

For decades, the Joint Distribution Committee has provided relief wherever needed around the world. (Luis Timisky, JDC 2004)

Humanitarian Relief in Rwanda

In 1994, JDC, the Jewish Coalition, and the African-American Institute raised funds for the provision of desperately needed emergency assistance for some two million Rwandans. JDC activities included emergency medical and public health care, food production, assistance to "unaccompanied minors" orphaned or separated from their families, and the training of professionals to provide trauma relief.

Kurdish Refugee Relief: Silopi, Turkey

In 1991, during the Gulf War, JDC helped to provide 6,000 residents of the Silopi refugee camp in southeast Turkey with health services, school, recreational facilities and supplies including winter clothing.

Ethiopia Famine Relief

Between 1986 and 1988, with U.S. Government assistance, JDC implemented three projects, one of which was a large-scale agricultural recovery program. Another brought clean water and electricity to the town of Teda, and the final project resulted in the installation of nine mobile plastic grain silos that were manufactured in Israel. The Ethiopian authorities cited JDC for its exemplary achievements.

Community brings conjoined twins to Toronto

By ERIN SILVER
Special to the CJN

If all goes according to plan, Toronto doctor Rachel Spitzer will have accomplished nothing short of a miracle.

After delivering conjoined twins Tinashe and Tinotanda in July last year in rural Zimbabwe, Spitzer embarked on a mission to save their lives. It's a feat that involved a lot of heart, a lot of cooperation and a lot of money, and it looks as if she will pull it off.

"Tinashe and Tinotanda were the first set of conjoined twins I had ever delivered, and when I saw them the day after they were born, I knew I couldn't just leave them lying there," says Spitzer, who was in Zimbabwe on a Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Humanitarian & Relief Committee-sponsored research mission at the Howard Hospital when she delivered the twins, who are joined at the liver.

"I got on the Internet and corresponded with surgeons around the world," says Spitzer, 28, a fourth year resident at the University of Toronto's Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology.

One of those e-mails was sent to Jacob Langer, chief of general surgery at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto. "I described the babies to Dr. Langer and he thought they were good candidates for surgery," says Spitzer.

Her next step was to apply to the Herbie Fund at the Hospital for Sick Children. "The Herbie Fund covers the medical costs of providing children from developing countries with life-saving surgery they can't get in their own country," she says. "By the time the twins were six weeks old, the Herbie Fund had agreed to cover their medical costs, which they estimate to be about $200,000."

Though raising the medical costs of the procedure is an accomplishment in itself, more help was required to cover the cost of airfare, accommodation, meals and incidental expenses to enable the twins' mother Elizabeth and their nurse Grace to accompany the babies to Toronto. For this, Spitzer turned to the Jewish community and sought the help of a number of organizations.

Ve'ahavta, which helped organize Spitzer's trip to Zimbabwe, was happy to help and quickly jumped on board as the Canadian host organization.

"We helped co-ordinate accommodations, meals and funds, and created a support network for the family," says Sarah Zelcer, director of education and assistant director of international programs for Ve'ahavta. "Many volunteers jumped at the chance to offer support.

Grace is now staying at the home of Lorne and Dena Vineberg. Their daughter Bekkie is Ve'ahavta's Canadian International Development Agency-funded intern at the Howard Hospital in Zimbabwe, and they visit the twins in the hospital, says Zelcer. Leya Aronson, clinical nursing leader at Sick Kids and longtime Ve'ahavta volunteer, took the lead in looking out for the babies and making sure their transition into Sick Kids was smooth. A number of other volunteers have welcomed Grace and Elizabeth into their homes, taken photos of them experiencing their first snowfall and taken them on tours around the city. In addition, the twins' visitors list has grown from three to 12, says Zelcer.

The Salvation Army, the Bessin Family Foundation, the Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists of Canada, CAA Central Ontario, two B'nai Brith Canada lodges, Forestdale Heights Lodge and Thornhill Lodge, Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and a number of individual donors contributed generously, helping Spitzer raise about $12,000 for the Ve'ahavta Twins Fund.

"It's amazing to watch how easily the community has formed during this difficult time and contributed such support," says Zelcer.

For all their efforts, Spitzer says she is "extraordinarily proud of the Jewish community. They have proved the value of tikkun olam and the benefit of assisting those we can wherever they come from. There are so many kids we can't help, and I'm glad this was a case where we could do something to help the twins survive. This has been such a privilege."

Zelcer says that "it's been very inspiring to see Rachel taking this on so completely and fully and bring everyone together. It's inspiring to watch Jews and non-Jews get together to support one another. This is a microcosm of what can happen in the world if people direct their sense of community and responsibility to crises in the world. A diverse group has joined together, and it's amazing to see and be part of."

The twins' surgery is scheduled tentatively for mid-February. Tinasha and Tinotenda are doing well as they await their operation at Sick Kids Hospital. Elizabeth and Grace are adjusting to the Canadian winter, with the Jewish community having equipped them with appropriate winter gear. They plan to return with the twins to Zimbabwe in April 2005.

Riverdale Shul survives near-death experience

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Members save Danforth synagogue from financial collapse

The mood was solemn as members and supporters of the Riverdale Shul filed into its sanctuary, a second-storey commercial space on the trendy Danforth strip in the city's east end.

Some 40 people were on hand for the Dec. 21 meeting held to discuss the fate of the small Orthodox congregation that was on the verge of collapse.

The news was grim. Steve Jackson, president, fundraiser and the current driving force behind the lay-led congregation, told the group he was overburdened running the synagogue alone.

The financial picture was also bleak, he said. The shul was about $15,000 in debt and the rent – $1,700 a month – was almost two months in arrears.

But as the meeting progressed, the death knell for the Riverdale Shul proved to be premature. After a tide of personal testimonials about the importance and uniqueness of the shul, financial pledges began to flow.

By the end of the meeting, the shul had a new fiscal lifeline. Enough money was committed to cover the December and January rent, and some shul members offered to make monthly contributions to help pay the rent in the future.

Jackson outlined changes that would need to be made for the long-term survival of the shul: membership dues would need to be initiated in order to solidify the shul's financial footing, and more hands-on help from the membership would be required to run shul programs and services.

Realtor Brent Pearlman, a former shul gabbai who presided over the meeting, explained, that in earlier years, dues weren't necessary because shul co-founder Simcha Jacobovici, a local documentary filmmaker, had been able to raise enough money to run the shul though gala community screenings of his films. That support dissipated when Jacobovici moved to Thornhill with his family three years ago.

Jackson stressed that support from community benefactors would not be forthcoming unless the shul sets up a stable financial structure.

The meeting drew people from outside the congregation who offered their skills in support of the shul. For instance, a young man, Yacov Bertilotti, who was on his way to Israel, postponed his travel plans and made himself available to help. Another volunteer, health executive Jacob Blum of Thornhill, offered to assist the congregation with administrative matters.

The synagogue came very close to shutting its doors, Jackson said. After conferring with Danforth businessman Saul Korman, a key supporter of the congregation since its inception 10 years ago, he and Korman decided to call the meeting as a last-ditch effort to save the shul.

Another meeting will be held in the new year to update the community on the shul's progress. As well, regular planning meetings will be scheduled so the shul can set up a board of directors and a formal list of paying members, as well as attend to other related administrative matters.

Jackson told The CJN he was heartened by offers of support and said he felt much more optimistic about the shul's prospects.

The meeting provided a forum for members to discuss the shul's role in their lives, and they spoke of its acceptance, warmth and informality.

"One day, I saw the sign for the shul and I just walked in," said Menashe Solomon, now the synagogue's chazzan. "I felt so welcomed, I have been coming ever since."

"This shul is so vital. It serves such an important role for this community," said travel agent Harriet Morton, who leads tours to China about Jewish history in that country. "The greater Jewish community needs to know that there is no other place like this anywhere."

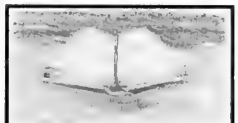
Finding face

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER



Pharaoh said to Moses, "Be gone! The moment you look upon my face again you shall die."

Moses replied, "You have spoken rightly. I shall not see your face again!"

But when the first-born of Egypt were struck, Pharaoh summoned Moses in the night and told him to leave Egypt.

How can we understand these verses? First Pharaoh promises that if Moses ever looks Pharaoh in the face again, he's a dead man, and Moses agrees. Then they meet in the night. Surely they must have seen each other face to face, yet Moses does not die.

The midrash believes that the words, "see my face," have a special meaning. These words indicate that the king has allowed a person into his presence, that the king has entered into a conversation with the visitor person-to-person. Not to look upon Pharaoh's face again means, "Don't ever come back into my presence, and don't ever again act so familiarly with me."

Midrash Rabbah explains that Pharaoh did not summon Moses. So Moses was not brought into his presence for conversation, and thus did not see his face. What does the Midrash think happened? The death of the first born has sent Pharaoh running to Moses in the night, but he does not speak to him face to face. The king of Egypt would hardly go to the quarters of a slave. Rather, he may have pounded on the door and called into the darkened interior with his message of freedom, calling to him to go away and never to come back.

For the Torah, as for all humanity, the face is a powerful symbol. If you haven't seen the face, you haven't seen the person. In Israel, when you're invited to a reception to meet people, you're invited to a kabbalat panim, a time for receiving faces. Moses and Pharaoh had reached the breaking point, unable to receive each other's face. But we can generally be friendly to those we encounter, bringing them some of the light of our personality. But do we?

The Jewish leader at the difficult time of the war with Rome in 70 CE was Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai. Despite the age in which he lived, a time when one Jew could hardly trust another because of the dangers of the day and the many political camps into which we were divided, it is said of Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai that no person ever greeted him first. He always extended himself to the other person, whether or not he had met them before.

Walking around Mirror Lake in Lake Placid, N.Y., I began in the usual city way, not acknowledging those who came into sight. But each walker and jogger greeted me. Soon I, too, began to greet them.

We can transform the little world around us into a warmer, more human place just by offering a greeting. Longtime members of synagogues often say, "I don't recognize too many faces here anymore." But they do have the opportunity to meet the newer members! Synagogue people share interests, and they deserve to meet, to see each other's faces, and to learn to recognize them.

Author Yaffa Eliach tells of a rabbi from Gdansk, Poland, which before the war had many German inhabitants. This rabbi greeted everyone he encountered, and when he walked in the country, he'd greet the farmers in their fields. "Good morning, Herr Muller," he'd say, and Herr Muller replied, "Good morning, Herr Rabbiner."

War broke out. Herr Muller joined the SS, and the rabbi was deported. A human wraith, he entered Auschwitz. There he faced selektia, the winnowing of those who would live from those who would die. As he came through the line, he recognized a familiar voice, and when he reached the head of the line, he said, "Good morning, Herr Muller."

"Good morning, Herr Rabbiner," responded the SS man, once a farmer. "What are you doing here?"

The rabbi could only smile faintly to such a question. Herr Muller lifted his baton and pointed to the right, to life. That is how this rabbi survived the war – all because he said good morning.

Sometimes that is also how we survive the daily wars of life, by offering a greeting and returning one, rejoicing in the small pleasantries and kindnesses we can offer. This week, summon the consummate chutzpah to say Shabbat Shalom to a person whose face you've never encountered before.

Tsunami defies vain intellectual gymnastics

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In the wake of the tsunami rolling over the world's sense of justice, we are faced yet again with questions of God's fairness. People throughout history have committed acts of unspeakable cruelty, but even in the worst case of the Holocaust, there is still a political dimension to the evil and the parts that were under human control. But natural disasters that kill thousands in the blink of an eye sweep away even those crumbs of purportedly rational interpretation.

As Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik so graphically expresses it, "there is evil, there is suffering, there are hellish torments in this world. Whoever wishes to delude himself by diverting his attention from the deep fissure in reality, by romanticizing human existence, is naught but a fool and a fantast."

How is one to respond to the seeming absence of God at times like these?

The temptation to explain beckons, but more often than not, it's one that should be resisted. Even as well-intended a book as Rabbi Harold Kushner's genuinely moving When Bad Things Happen to Good People falls into the trap of theorizing about the impenetrable. Rabbi Kushner proposes that there is a limit to the scope of God's involvement in human affairs and thus His ability to affect the course of human life. We suffer not because God is testing or punishing us, but because God cannot always or necessarily deflect our pain.

One might link this discussion to the current Asian tragedy by proclaiming that tectonic plates being what they are, the spectre of nature wreaking havoc on human life is inevitable and unstoppable. Maimonides and others repeatedly emphasize that God will take great pains to avoid tampering with the system of nature that He has set in place. But all of this is scant comfort for those in agony. When and on what basis God could intervene to aid human beings is, in Rabbi Kushner's universe, a mystery without an answer, which leads to further questions about the efficacy or even the point of prayer, as well as the fairness of providence.

In times of calamity, there is a tension between the desire to explain and the reality of unfathomable affliction. Sometimes, a measure of spiritual discipline – the admission of the awesome inadequacy of the intellect to comprehend the adversities of life – serves us better than any attempt, however sincere, to untangle the catastrophe, to do what Rabbi Soloveitchik calls camouflaging the evil "with vain intellectual gymnastics."

Educators, often feeling the pressure and desperation of those they teach, seek to provide answers – solid, unwavering, final – on the theodicy issue, but they may find themselves succumbing to well-worn formulae, a mistake that is revealed in the Book of Job.

When Job's "friends" confidently announce that he must be receiving deserved punishment for his sins, Job rejects their neat equations of sin with punishment. His disgust is vindicated in the end when God roundly criticizes their behaviour and their simplistic worldview.

Neat and tidy theories or easy religious dogma on this most difficult of all questions do a great disservice not only to those who have suffered but also, the Book of Job suggests, to God Himself.

Jewish Life

Books – the companions of our lives

Books
Bernard Baskin

You may not read books, but it is impossible to ignore them. Despite the omnipresence of TV and the pervasive nature of technology, the influence of books on our lives is indisputable.

Almost every religion has been founded on a text, on a book. In fact, the word "bible" itself comes from the Latin "biblia" and means "book – the book." The role of the book in religion and life is indisputable. Great books – classical books – are the lighthouses erected in the sea of time.

If clothes make the outer man, books make his inner world. The lawyer, the doctor, the minister, the engineer, the teacher all use the book as their main tool of learning, teaching and building.

Songs from books and nursery stories lulled us to sleep in our childhood. Books were the companions of our school days, the most intimate friends of mature years at college and at home. Books become our companions in old age and provide consolation as well as wisdom.

For Jews, books are especially precious and always have been throughout our history. What other people can boast of teachings such as these contained in the 13th-century sefer Chassidim: "If a drop of ink fell at the same time on your book and on your coat, clean the book first and then the garment" and "if a man in straitened circumstances must sell his property, he should first dispose of his jewelry, his house and estate, and only when no other alternative is left should he strip himself of his library." In case of fire or flood, books had to be rescued before all other possessions.

The historian Cecil Roth reminded us that almost every Jew – however humble his circumstances and however lowly his calling – was likely to have his modest library. A book was not to him, as to his neighbour, an object of veneration, of mystery or of distrust. It was a sheer necessity of everyday life.

I would like to share with you a number of choice quotations culled from a variety of sources.

• "What progress we are making. In the Middle Ages, they would have burned me; nowadays they are content with burning my books." Sigmund Freud, soon after a Nazi book-burning orgy.

• "If anyone asks you if you've read all those books, it means you don't have enough books." Chaim Grade

• "Never lend books – nobody ever returns them; the only books I have in my library are those which people have lent me." Anatole France

• "Outside of a dog, a book is man's best friend; inside of a dog, it's too dark to read." Groucho Marx

• "Make books thy companions; let thy cases of books be thy pleasure gardens and grounds. Bask in their paradise." Judah ibn Tibbon

• "Book lovers are thought by unbookish people to be gentle and unworldly, and perhaps a few of them are so. But there are others who will lie and scheme and steal to get books as wildly and unconscionably as the dope taker in pursuit of his drug. They may not want the books to read immediately, or at all; they want them to possess, to range on their shelves, to have at command. They want books as a Turk is thought to want concubines – not to be hastily deflowered, but to be kept at their master's call, and enjoyed more often in thought than in reality." Robertson Davies

Suffering and faith – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"There was a great and mighty wind, splitting mountains and shattering rocks by the power of God, but God was not in the wind. After the wind – an earthquake, but God was not in the earthquake. After the earthquake – fire, but God was not in the fire. And after the fire – a soft murmuring sound." (I Kings 19:11-12) [http://tinyurl.com/4yhcf]

How can we make sense of the loss of life and destruction in Southeast Asia? As we watch the traumatic events unfold and consider the years of pain awaiting the people of the region, questions surface about suffering and faith. Jewish thinkers have long debated the meaning of suffering, whether caused by natural disasters, by human savagery or by the death of a child.

As we explore their writings, you may agree or disagree strongly. But the writers mentioned would agree that the biggest crime would be to let painful events pass by without proper introspection. If you are grappling with your own suffering, nothing can replace the personal guidance of a trusted rabbi.

At MyJewishLearning.com, Or Rose, in The Holocaust: Responding to Modern Suffering, looks at Jewish responses to suffering.

Abraham Isaac Kook (1865-1935), the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, "understood life to include two cosmic forces: good and evil, both emanating directly from the divine… Kook saw all of life as striving for perfection, a perfection that would eventually include the transformation of evil (not its destruction) and its elevation to the holy."

Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan (1881-1983), founder of Reconstructionist Judaism, "insisted that the events that we commonly refer to as 'natural evils' or 'natural disasters' bear no moral weight. They are simply organic processes at work in the world, as it evolves and strives for fulfilment."

Rabbi Yoel Teitlebaum, the Satmar Rebbe, addressed the cause of the Holocaust in his book VaYoel Moshe. Rose writes that Teitlebaum felt "the Holocaust was a divine punishment for the secular Zionist efforts to create a modern Jewish state in Israel. He condemned this endeavour as a blasphemous attempt at returning to the Promised Land prematurely, that is, before the messianic age. Thus Rabbi Teitlebaum understood the Holocaust in terms of traditional covenantal theology, as a punishment for Jewish sins."

Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907-1972) "argued that the Holocaust should move people to examine their own behaviour, and not that of God: 'The question about Auschwitz is not where was God, but where was man?' In a world where men and women are given free will (as the Hebrew Bible insists), we are accountable for our own moral failings." [http://tinyurl.com/6ybgf]

Rabbi Nosson Scherman wrote Finding God in the Rubble shortly after the events of 9/11. In it, he mentions that after those attacks, "our leaders exhorted us to go back to business as usual, attend ball games, spend money, and otherwise show [Osama] Bin Laden and company that America cannot be cowed or intimidated – or forced into soul-searching." Scherman then quotes the 19th-century rabbi, the Chofetz Chaim. He "would say that a famine in India or an earthquake in Japan was meant to tell us something – and it surely was not that God wanted to remind us to attend ball games… To the contrary, [these tragedies] SHOULD change us – or rather we should be wise enough to know that God was orchestrating events to wake us up." [http://tinyurl.com/3zu2s]

For more thought-provoking essays, I recommend Ellen Horowitz's The Infinite Scream. [http://tinyurl.com/7yjrr], Rebbetzin Tzipporah Heller's Trusting God [http://tinyurl.com/5b28n], and Elie Wiesel on Hope, Despair and Memory.

"Let us remember Job who, having lost everything – his children, his friends, his possessions, and even his argument with God – still found the strength to begin again, to rebuild his life. Job was determined not to repudiate the creation, however imperfect, that God had entrusted to him." [http://tinyurl.com/52ddg], Wiesel writes.

Innovative JCC arts programmer retires

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Chanukah marked the final work week of one of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's most innovative staff. Frances Enchin, director of Jewish life – arts and culture, has retired after 10 years in a variety of positions.

"Frances has made a tremendous impact at the centre in programming, in Jewish education and in Jewish culture," said JCC executive director Bryan Keshen.

His words were echoed by Harriet Wichin, cultural arts programming director. "Frances has created the Jewish literary presence in the community centre," Wichin said. "Frances is passionate about Jewish downtown... She brought a greater Jewish identity to my life and to the centre."

Indeed, Enchin has been responsible for creating a host of Jewish programs during her tenure, among them, Books and Bagels, a monthly Sunday Jewish reading series that has featured some of the most prominent contemporary Jewish writers in Canada.

Her involvement with the JCC began when her son Aaron, now 17, began attending the pre-school program there.

Her connection to the JCC and the First Narayever Congregation on Brunswick Avenue "made it possible to live downtown and sustain a Jewish life," she said.

Ten years ago, Enchin joined the JCC program committee as a volunteer. With her son and daughter Margot, now 14, then attending the Downtown Jewish Community School, Enchin identified a programming vacuum.

"I thought it was important to have Sunday morning cultural programs at the JCC," she said. "The idea was that people bring kids to Hebrew school or work out, so Sunday was an opportunity for them to educate themselves Jewishly in a non-threatening environment. They could hear a lecture, listen to a writer or learn an aspect of Jewish life.

"We now have weekly Sunday cultural programs for adults – usually at 11 a.m. – called Sundays on Bloor. We have all kinds of Jewish learning and lecture series, including Books and Bagels seven or eight times a year."

She noted that her ideas were in sync with a growing desire "to see the JCC as a place that could celebrate the arts and culture as a downtown Jewish institution."

She was able to draw on the skills and talents of many local Jewish artists. "I was fortunate to be able to tap into this. The result has been a rich Jewish cultural program based at the JCC."

The late Bill Emery, former JCC executive director, supported Enchin's initiatives when she was a volunteer. "Bill Emery of blessed memory was open to innovation," she recalled. "If you had an idea, he'd say, 'Give it a try,' and I did."

Her first idea was to start Books and Bagels. "It was surprisingly easy to get authors to read. A lot of writers are somewhat isolated from their readers... They welcome the opportunity to read.

"When new books are coming out, they need venues. We offer a good downtown venue for Jewish writers... We've had the cream of Jewish writing in this part of Canada."

Participants have included Howard Engel, Lillian Nattel, Harold Troper, Karen Tulchinsky and the late Matt Cohen. "We launch Parchment, the magazine of new Jewish literary works, which comes out once a year."

Another popular literary program, Between Stages, featuring Jewish playwrights and or actors giving readings, has attracted such theatre luminaries as Adam and Jordan Pettle, Alon Nashman, and Jeff Sherman. "Anybody who is anybody in Jewish theatre has performed, has read or has spoken, " Enchin said.

In spite of the chaos of the JCC's protracted renovations, Enchin ran her programs, including Holocaust Education Week, Yiddish and holiday programming and special events such as the Fiddler on the Roof sing-along.

Over the years, Enchin's role expanded from volunteer to part-time public relations staff. Her responsibilities grew significantly following the death of program director Florence Marantz in 2000.

Now, Enchin will be going full circle. She will be putting on her old volunteer hat and continuing to run Books and Bagels.

After six-day weeks, she said it's time for her family. "I want to spend time with my children when they really need me. They're quite excited about it."

She said the job was a "wonderful experience with a great team," but it has been demanding. "You could never be off. You're always thinking about the work when you're involved in programming. You always have an eye on the possibilities.

"You go to a party – someone has a great idea and you think, 'Hmm, maybe we should do this.' You go to an exhibition and you think, 'Hmm, maybe we should have this.' You hear a band and you wonder if we can get them to play. In a way, that's what made the job so marvellous."

Rabbis join multi-faith tsunami prayer service

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Regardless of which faith we belong to, we can all work together under the eyes of one God, religious and political leaders told a multi-faith prayer service for victims of the Asian tsunami.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl

The Saturday-evening event at Ram Mandir Hindu Temple in Mississauga – led by its head priest, Pandit Roopnauth Sharma – was also attended by Muslim, Christian, Buddhist, Sikh and Jewish clergy.

Representing the Jewish community at the service, which incorporated prayer, music, and messages of hope, were Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation and Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Mississauga's Solel Congregation.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told the gathering of about 60 people that the tsunami tragedy brings hope because people all over the world have been drawn closer together.

"If there is anything that we can learn from this, it is first of all, that our grief and sadness is shared with others, a recognition that beyond individual nations and religions, there is a universal unity," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

> 'We assemble today united in grief and challenged in our faith to understand the tragedy that has befallen so many innocent people'

The rabbi said his sentiments echo the thoughts of the Jewish community, which has been actively raising money for people affected by the disaster.

"Our community has been collecting money for rescue and relief throughout North America," he said. "The Jewish community has been at work, trying to do our part along with others, and in addition many of us have joined together in prayer."

According to the United Jewish Communities, North American Jewish groups have has so far raised $10 million (US) for relief in the 11 countries where the combined death toll has passed 150,000.

In a prayer led by Rabbi Englander, he asked God for guidance during a time when some might be questioning their faith.

"We assemble today united in grief and challenged in our faith to understand the tragedy that has befallen so many innocent people," he said.

"Even in the midst of tragedy, may we hear your voice urging all your children to live together as one human family to build a world in which every human life is sacred."

Among the politicians addressing the service was Mississauga-Brampton South MP Navdeep Bains. He echoed Rabbi Englander's sentiment, saying, "The tsunami didn't discriminate, nor should we."

Mississauga Mayor Hazel McCallion also spoke to the gathering.

"We are together tonight to pray for those that have been so devastated by this terrible situation, but also to pray for those that survived and to extend our love, our understanding, our prayers and most of all our resources," she said.

The event was co-organized by the Ram Mandir Hindu Temple and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, CCCJ spokesperson Judy Csillag said.

UIA study examines poverty in Jewish community

By far the largest group of Jewish poor are those over 65. Nearly 20 per cent of Jewish seniors, or 12,105 people, live in poverty – "an especially vulnerable group."

The report calls on Jewish communal agencies to change the way they help the poor.

It acknowledges that local federations provide a "host" of responses, including education subsidies, emergency financial assistance, food services and affordable counselling.

"But these services provide short-term solutions and do little to address the underlying problems at the root of poverty, such as inadequate income, social inequities and exclusion. Local communities need to focus on system change and partner with other communities and advocacy groups to confront the larger social and economic issues that support poverty."

The study suggests that Jewish agencies explore working with anti-poverty and consumer groups to press for changes to government policies on affordable housing, the minimum wage and work training programs.

The "noteworthy" number on Jewish child poverty "necessitates that agencies consider how better to help large families." They must also consider working with other groups within the Jewish community "to develop responses that respect differences in language, observance and culture," the report states.

Although the community is doing more to help the poor than ever before, Levin of JF&CS agrees that there are gaps.

"We're certainly not doing everything that can be done. We should be working toward providing more subsidized housing, and reach out more to immigrants and the marginalized."

The study relies on the standard measure of poverty employed by Statistics Canada: the low-income cut-off, or LICO, which measures how much of an individual's or family's total income is spent on food, clothing and shelter. A household that spends half or more of its total income on these necessities is considered in "strained" circumstances.

The study concedes, however, that using the LICO measurement can be arbitrary, because it does not take assets into account.

The rate of Jewish poverty has held steady over the past 30 years at around 13.5 per cent.

In absolute terms, however, the number of Jewish poor has grown by 27 per cent since 1971, slightly less than the 31 per cent rise in the Jewish population since that year.

In the decade prior to the 2001 national census, the increase in Jewish poverty was just 1.2 per cent, representing an additional 575 people.

Despite the marginal growth, "the number of Jewish poor in this country has been rising steadily in the last three decades and will likely continue to rise, despite the efforts of individual Jewish communities to deal with this complex problem," the report states.

Among the study's more alarming findings is that 14 per cent of Jewish children under the age of five live in "economically vulnerable circumstances." As well, one in seven Jewish teenagers and young adults (aged 15 to 24) live in poverty.

The study adds that children from low-income families are more likely to suffer from high levels of anxiety, aggressiveness, hyperactivity and low self-esteem. "In short, poverty can take a serious toll on the social and psychological wellbeing of children."

The largest numbers of Jewish poor are in Ontario (23,550) and Quebec (17,395). Quebec has the largest proportion of poor Jews of any province, at just over 18 per cent. Toronto has the most poor Jews in terms of sheer numbers, at 19,745, with Montreal tallying 17,100.

However, Montreal has just over one-third of all Jewish poor in Canada, but it has only one-quarter of the Jewish population.

And the largest number of poor Jewish children – 3,875 – live in Quebec, which has the highest incidence of Jewish child poverty, at 21 per cent. The study says that is likely because of Montreal's large haredi population and its larger-than-average family sizes.

Montreal, the report concludes, is Canada's poorest Jewish city.

"Unfortunately, the level of Jewish poverty in Montreal is in line with the general rate. Montreal is the poverty capital of Canada," said Gail Small, executive director of Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute in Montreal.

"The large elderly population, including many Holocaust survivors, and [the haredi] population contribute to the level. The situation is compounded by the shortage of reasonably priced housing in Montreal now."

Small said Jewish poverty is a growing problem that should be a higher priority for the community , and it's one that requires "more creative responses, in both helping with basic needs and in capacity-building [among the poor]."

The community needs to work more with non-Jewish social advocacy groups to influence public policy, she added.

The report also noted that the Vancouver area has 3,150 Jewish poor, and that there are "significant" contingents of Jewish poor in Winnipeg (1,830), Ottawa (1,320) and Calgary (815).

Survivors, young adults share stories

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

About 60 Holocaust survivors and 200 young adults met over dinner recently at an evening sponsored by the new leadership division of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

The dinner, held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, was co-chaired by Sherri Rotstein and Shawna Spiegelman. It provided a "rare opportunity" for the young adults to hear first-hand about survivors' experiences during World War II, Rotstein said.

Rotstein, 24, and Spiegelman, 24, who also co-chair Yad Vashem's new leadership division, organized the dinner because they wanted to find a way for their contemporaries to learn about the Holocaust.

"People our age do not know much about [it], and for the most part they're not interested in going to lectures," said Spiegelman, a marketing analyst whose grandparents are survivors.

"We had to find a way to get them to come out and get educated," said Rotstein, a supply teacher, BBYO adviser, and past participant in the March of the Living.

They planned a small dinner, they said, and were overwhelmed with the response. "We expected about 25 survivors, but we got [more than double that] plus guests," Rotstein said.

"Some young people came just for an evening out, and others came because their friends invited them. [For whatever reason], the feedback was tremendous. They were interested in the survivors' stories, and many want to become involved in our organization."

For many of the survivors, Rotstein said, it was the first time they had told their stories to younger people.

"Some had found it too painful to speak about their experiences to their own grandchildren, and they welcomed the chance to speak to young adults, many who had never spoken to a survivor."

The dinner "was a labour of love. We planned everything ourselves, from the invitations to the menu to the seating plan. We're prepared to plan our own weddings now," Spiegelman joked.

Each table had a moderator, eight young people and two or three survivors. "Each survivor briefly shared their story, and then the others were given a chance to ask questions. Each table was a unique experience," Rotstein said.

"It was an intimate environment. We served a 'comfort' meal of matzah ball soup, roast chicken and vegetables, and everyone was comfortable enough to talk easily to each other."

The dinner was held during Chanukah, said Spiegelman, so each survivor was asked to bring a menorah. "A highlight of the evening was when the menorahs were lit. We looked around the room, and saw people of each age group basking in the light."

She said that keynote speaker, Michael Soberman, director of the Canada-Israel Experience, mentioned in his address that this is the last generation to hear the stories directly from survivors.

The pair was "delighted" to hear that a number of young people and survivors shared phone numbers. "This dinner was beyond our expectations. When something is done for the first time, you never know how it will be received," Spiegelman said.

"Many people indicated on a questionnaire that they would attend cultural discussion groups or weekend retreats," she added.

"It was a project from our heart, and it was received that way," Rotstein said.

3,000 poor Jewish children in Toronto

Toronto and Montreal are virtually tied when it comes to poverty among Jews over 65, at 21 per cent each.

There are more than 3,000 poor Jewish children in the Toronto area, the study reports.

Nearly 10 per cent of Jewish families in Canada are headed by single parents, and they are raising about 30 per cent of the community's poor children, a finding the study calls "sobering."

The report also notes that the Jewish poor "face an additional burden" in paying for kosher food, holidays items, synagogue dues and school fees.

Among the report's other findings:

- Senior Jewish women are twice as likely to be poor as senior men (25 per cent versus 13 per cent).
- More than half of Jewish individuals (51 per cent) relying on social assistance or worker's compensation live in poverty. Among those aged 55 to 64 who rely on such payments, the poverty rate is a "staggering" 66 per cent.
- There are more than 10,000 Jewish "working poor" in Canada – those who earn wages that are not enough to lift them out of poverty.
- There are 6,560 poor elderly Jewish widows in Canada, and 3,325 married seniors who are poor.
- The largest bloc of Jewish poor have only an elementary or secondary school education. However, five per cent of poor Jews have a medical or doctoral degree.

A previous study, released last summer, found that one-quarter of Canada's 23,000-plus Holocaust survivors are poor, and that more than 3,000 survivors are poor and live alone.

The current report's results differ from a 1999 study by Carleton University professor Allan Moscovitch, who found the Jewish poverty rate in Canada was 17 per cent.

A Very Long Engagement הוא סיפור אהבה צרפתי אדות נערה יפה שאהובה יצא למלחמת העולם הראשונה ולא חזר חביתה. למרות שכל העדויות מראות שהוא מת בשדה הקרב מאמינה אהובתו שהוא חי ומוכיחה את כוחה של האהבה. סיפור מדהים, צילומים מדהימים, קולנוע אירופאי כמו שרק אירופה יכולה. עשר בסולם קורן.

Forgery found in popular antiquities exhibition

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Ivory pomegranate found to be forgery.

MONTREAL – The small ivory pomegranate ornament touted as probably the only discovered archeological evidence of Solomon's Temple, and which was featured at the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition that was in Canada for 10 months, is a forgery, the Israel Museum said.

The Jerusalem-based museum announced that a study it completed with the Israel Antiquities Authority, "using advanced scientific tools," found that the ancient Hebrew inscription on the ornament was "added in modern times." The ornament itself is also much older than originally thought.

"Based on its inscription, the pomegranate has been considered the only known relic from the First Temple in Jerusalem. The new study shows that the object itself dates to the Late Bronze Period (14th-13th century BCE), but its inscription is not ancient," museum director James Snyder said in an e-mail.

The museum had believed the ornament dated from the 8th century BCE. The Temple, built by King Solomon in the 10th century BCE, according to most experts, was destroyed by the Babylonians 400 years later.

The pomegranate, measuring less than two inches high, is thought to be the head of a ceremonial scepter.

It was among some 100 artifacts, along with three fragments of the Scrolls, that were in "Archeology and the Bible: From King David to the Dead Sea Scrolls," which closed at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Gatineau, Que., in April after a four-month run. The exhibition was previously at Montreal's Pointe-a-Calliere Museum from June to November, 2003.

The pomegranate, however, was highlighted as one of the most remarkable pieces on display and had rarely been sent abroad.

The Israel Museum bought the pomegranate in 1988 for $550,000 (US) with a donation, Snyder said. The piece first surfaced in 1979 in an antiquities dealer's shop in Jerusalem, and was identified as a huge discovery by Andre Lemaire, a prominent paleographer at the Sorbonne, in a 1981 report that attracted worldwide attention. The acquisition was controversial because the seller was anonymous, the object's provenance was unknown, and the identity of the donor that enabled the purchase was not revealed.

"Prior to its entering the [Israel] Museum collection, it was examined by numerous experts in the field, chief among them the late professor Nahman Avigad, a renowned epigraphist from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who deemed it authentic," Snyder told The CJN.

Over the years, the pomegranate was examined by scholars from various scientific fields, none of whom raised any doubts about authenticity, he added.

Snyder emphasized that the Israel Museum, which has one of the most important collections of [illegible] and antiquities in the world, [illegible] does ongoing research on its archeological holdings as new techniques are developed.

"We believe it is important for the public to understand the continuing process of archeological authentication, the techniques involved, and the interplay of scholarship, connoisseurship and science, which informs archeological research," Snyder said.

A former director of New York's Museum of Modern Art, Snyder became director of the Israel Museum in 1996.

The Israel Museum is keeping the pomegranate on view, alongside a silver amulet inscribed with a priestly blessing. The amulet's origin in 600 BCE during the First Temple period was recently re-confirmed through new technological means. Its age had previously been established through "scholarship and connoisseurship," Snyder said.

The museum re-examined the pomegranate with a new type of microscope which detected synthetic material in the inscription, between the ivory and the patina.

The pomegranate is the third case of sophisticated forgery of biblical artifacts uncovered recently in Israel. Four antique dealers and collectors were charged late last month with adding inscriptions to genuine artifacts to greatly inflate their value. Police said the operation may have been going on for 20 years.

Before the pomegranate, other major forgeries were found on the ossuary that reputedly held the bones of James, Jesus' brother (which was shown at the Royal Ontario Museum in 2003), and a stone tablet fragment inscribed with repair plans for Solomon's Temple.

Victor Rabinovitch, president and CEO of the Museum of Civilization, said he has no regrets about making the pomegranate a star attraction. Everyone involved was acting on the "overwhelming consensus among experts" at the time, he said, adding that any good museum must continuously scrutinize its holdings and be prepared to inevitably find something that isn't what it was believed to be, or that is even fraudulent.

"It's too bad it turned out not to be what it was purported to be, but in no way does this detract from the value of the exhibition as a

Can Abbas bring democracy to the PA?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As of this writing, just preceding the Jan. 9 elections for the Palestinian Authority president, the human tragedy caused by the tsunami in Southeast Asia is dominating the Western media.

Still, it was anticipated that as the elections got underway, there would be substantial media attention even though there was very little doubt that PLO chairman and Fatah candidate Mahmoud Abbas would become the new PA president. The question was, how much of a victory would it be? What percentage of the vote would he receive, how would he govern and would true democratic institutions emerge?

While there would be little drama about the result, the significance of the election itself as an expression of a nascent stirring of democracy should not be underestimated.

Not to be overlooked was the amount of media discussion just prior to the Asian tragedy that was devoted to the possibility of democratic reform in the broader Arab/Islamic world.

Several major news outlets covered the failed Islamic conference held in mid-December in Rabat, Morocco, on this very subject. It failed because instead of proposing constructive steps towards actual reforms, the conference found excuses to avoid them.

In the Globe and Mail on Dec. 22, Marcus Gee wrote that "Every hoary excuse under the Saharan sun came out, from the cultural excuse ('Western' democracy doesn't fit with Islamic values) to the economic excuse (we can't bother with democracy while our people are poor) to the stability excuse (we want peace, not politics).

"But the topper came from Prince Saud al-Faisal, Foreign Minister of Saudi Arabia. Islamic countries could not possibly be expected to discuss reform, al-Faisal said, as long as the Israeli-Palestinian dispute was still raging and the United States was favouring Israel."

Gee may be right that a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would eliminate one grievance articulated by the Arab/Muslim world. But there would always be another to hold against the Jewish state. When Israelis and Palestinians were negotiating full Palestinian rights and an "end to conflict" at Camp David in the summer of 2000 and in the period immediately following, Egypt and Saudi Arabia reportedly played obstructionist roles on the issue of Jewish sovereignty over the Temple Mount.

Several Israeli analysts, including those who strongly support Palestinian rights and statehood, recognize that major elements of the Egyptian and Saudi governments have still not truly reconciled themselves to Israel's existence as a Jewish state.

Gee was certainly correct to observe: "This [preoccupation with Israel] is both the oldest and weakest excuse for the woeful lack of democracy and freedom in the Arab world. Why on earth should its dispute with Israel over the rights of the Palestinians prevent Saudi Arabia from having a free press, or Egypt free elections or Syria independent judges. Why should the fact that the United States is Israel's ally prevent any of these things?"

Israel has always been the convenient excuse for Arab governments to maintain repressive policies and avoid the reforms that are necessary to emerge from the political and economic backwater in which they have existed for decades.

To explain, Gee cited New York-based Freedom House, which monitors and helps promote democracy throughout the world. The organization points out that while the number of electoral democracies around the globe has grown by about 20 per cent over the last twelve years, "no country in the Arab Middle East has yet adopted significant liberalization in its political system."

Freedom House acknowledges that there have been "small gains" in civil liberties in Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, and Qatar, especially in the area of women's rights, but it said there have been "no gains" in political rights.

In a Jan. 1 editorial, the Globe called the Middle East "the stoniest ground" for democracy. The Palestinian Authority now has an opportunity to make a dent in this hard surface. Whether Abbas has the capacity and will to do so remains an open question.

Adath Israel Congregation

The Adath Israel Seminars, beginning in January, and at no charge to the registrants, will provide a wide variety of significant Jewish learning experiences, ranging from basic knowledge to the sophisticated literary and philosophical expressions.

Sundays at 9:00 a.m.

The Philosophy of Jewish Law

led by Rabbi Benjamin Hecht

The seminar continues the very popular discussions which have occasionally, and still do, raise eyebrows among Jewish scholars of our Law.

Sundays at 10:30 a.m.

Much More Than Siddur on Sunday

led by Hana Werner

The seminar explores the fascinating historical, literary, and traditional backgrounds which have been threaded into the Siddur and which have given spirit, strength, and leadership to our daily prayer services.

Mondays at 7:30 p.m. on February 7, 14, 21, 28

How to Talk to Your Children About Being Jewish led by Rabbi Steven Saltzman and Chaim Klein

The seminar deals with the ethical and moral problems that must be faced by parents in a Jewish environment, and also the lessons that Jewish parents ought to teach their children.

Tuesdays at 7:30 p.m. on February 8, 15, 22, March 1

Modern Jewish Literature

led by Kenneth Sherman

The seminar, through the works of several modern Jewish writers, including Isaac Babel, Franz Kafka, Saul Bellow, Cynthia Ozick, and Leonard Cohen, will explore the essential characteristics of Jewish literature.

Tuesdays at 7:30 p.m. on February 8, 15, 22, March 1

Navigating the Worship Service

led by Hana Werner

The seminar will discuss the meaning and choreography of our daily service.. Learn about the prayers, structure and various rituals and customs that are a part of the synagogue service.

Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m. on February 9, 16, 23, March 2, 9, 16

Learning to Chant Torah

led by Rabbi David Seed

The seminar will teach the basic skills needed to chant Torah. No prior Torah reading skills are required but a basic Hebrew reading ability is necessary.

Mondays at 8:00 p.m. on March 28, April 4, April 11

Jewish Ethical Dilemnas

led by Cantor A. E. Kirshblum

The seminar provides insight into a Jewish response to contemporary ethical issues which include abortion, assisted suicide, and stem cell research.

Try some St. John's bread on Tu b'Shvat

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Once, in Israel, many years ago, I stood on a hilltop facing the most impossibly beautiful grove of ancient olive trees.

The guide who led our group of boisterous friends to the site stood with one sandaled foot braced behind the other to keep steady on the slopping terrain as he spoke with pride about the healthy grove and the fact that those very olive trees have grown for generations and still bear their best voluptuous fruit.

The day was dry, sunny and hot, and as I stood there taking in the rugged landscape, his voice and the restless noises of my friends began to fade, and I was alone, watching the wide silver-leafed trees, with thick gnarled branches spreading, almost touching one another, shading the gravelled soil, telling their strong story of survival – how they have stood right there for so many years, for so many people. And I could hear their wise heartbeat.

On Tu b'Shvat, The new year for the trees, it is a well-known custom to plant or make donations to plant new trees in Israel. But a lesser known custom mentioned in several of my reference books is eating the fruits of the trees of Israel, such as olives, dates; almonds, walnuts and carob, or as it is interestingly called, St. John's bread.

When I read about this odd name for an Israeli fruit, I kept looking for a recipe. Surely someone, over all these years, would have decided to create something fitting the title. I looked through old and new Jewish cookbooks, several baking cookbooks and in my favourite bread book. No luck. So I bought some carob chips, the sweet chocolate tasting morsels made from carob powder, and I set about to create the bread myself.

Since, along with the carob, different nuts and dried fruits are often included in Tu b'Shvat meals, I decided almonds and dates would be a nice complement.

After some experimenting, the bread that emerged was deep mocha in colour and even deeper in taste. The dates, almonds and carobs offer little visual contrast to the brown bread, but the taste is quietly fulfilling like an old family recipe. Yet the melting carob hidden inside makes it taste exciting and new at the same time. Something like the sensation I had all those years ago when I was very young, facing trees that were very old, showing me that despite everything, they grew taller and richer and fuller, bearing their proud fruit, silent witnesses of an ever-changing landscape, year after year.

ST. JOHN'S BREAD

This bread is truly delicious. I bake many fruit and nut breads, but this one's dark, homey appearance adds to the rich surprise of flavour. One hint: make sure you like the coffee you use because it is a strong flavour ingredient.

1 cup fresh dates, chopped small
¾ cup strong coffee, boiling hot
⅔ cup sugar
1 generous tbsp. butter or margarine, room temperature
1 large egg
1¾ cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla
¼ cup almonds, chopped or sliced
¼ cup carob morsels

Preheat oven to 350. Brush a 9 x 5 x 3-inch loaf pan with melted butter or coat with vegetable spray.

In a small, heatproof bowl, pour boiling hot coffee over cut-up dates. Set aside to cool.

Sift flour, baking soda and salt together.

In bowl of electric mixer, cream butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add egg and mix well.

Add date mixture alternately with flour mixture and vanilla into bowl of electric mixture, mixing until all ingredients are blended without overmixing. With spatula, fold in nuts and carob and transfer into loaf pan, smoothing top.

Bake 45 to 50 minutes or until knife in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on wire rack for 10 minutes. Turn out onto rack to cool completely. Makes 1 loaf.

McMaster student sheds pounds to feed hungry Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

For five years running, the restaurant chain Pita Pit has challenged its customers to lose as much weight as they can in eight weeks, with the biggest loser winning free pitas for a year.

As if a better body and free sandwiches weren't enough incentive to shed excess pounds, Brandon deSilva, president of McMaster University's Jewish Student Association (JSA), has found another way to motivate himself.

The fourth-year student has opted to use the contest as a way to feed hungry children in Israel by finding sponsors to donate money for each of the 15 pounds he hopes to shed.

"I came up with the idea when I was at shul, and I figured it was an easy way for people to help out and do a lot of mitzvahs at once," deSilva said.

DeSilva was inspired by an e-mail from an Israel list about Meir Panim, an organization that operates soup kitchens in nine Israeli communities in an attempt to feed the country's 670,000 children, and others, who go hungry on a daily basis.

Meir Panim's mission statement says that its "Meals for Children" program "guarantees that every needy child in Israel will receive at least one hot, nourishing meal every day, and thus maintain his health, smile and dignity."

By donating 100 per cent of the proceeds to Meir Panim, deSilva hopes to help it tackle this widespread problem.

"Israel is the only Jewish country in the world. It is supposed to be our homeland. With hundreds of thousands of kids and adults going hungry, something needs to be done," he said.

Before the contest began on Monday, deSilva had already managed to collect more than $100 a pound, and he is confident he'll reach his goal of $2,000.

Brandon DeSilva

He was too shy to reveal what he currently weighs. "My sponsors are the only ones who need to know how much I weigh."

DeSilva also said he wants to set an example for those hoping to raise money for Israel, or to help others in need, such as people affected by the tsunami in Southeast Asia.

He will be collecting donations throughout the eight-week challenge, and he already has sponsorships ranging from 50 cents a pound to $20 a pound.

DeSilva can be reached via e-mail at bdesilva@gmail.com.

MOUNTAINS OF MITTENS: United Synagogue Day School students recently concluded their Mountains of Mittens campaign, initiated by Jewish Women International members and organized by USDS teacher Carole Traister. Students and staff collected mittens, hats and scarves for children whose families have difficulty providing these things. Students from grades 1 to 3 are seen with Traister and bags filled with the items they collected.

U of T law professor works for int'l human rights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Noah Novogrodsky, a University of Toronto law professor, regards human rights with the utmost seriousness.

Academia

He fought for and established Canada's first, and still only, international human rights legal clinic, at the U of T's faculty of law. The clinic, of which he is the director, began operations in September 2003.

"It aims to provide representation and advocacy for groups and individuals engaged in international human rights cases," explained the 34-year-old Toronto-born professor.

It also gives 14 law students per year an opportunity to study international human rights cases and receive four credits toward their degree.

"We're training the next generation of Canadian human rights advocates to follow in the humanitarian tradition of John Humphrey, Louise Arbour and Stephen Lewis," he observed.

"We work on three kinds of cases," Novogrodsky added. "Claims in Canadian courts involving international human rights concerns, cases in foreign courts dealing with comparative Canadian jurisprudence, and cases before truly international tribunals."

As an example, Novogrodsky cited the Leon Mugesera case.

Mugesera, a Rwandan politician who obtained residency status in Canada eight years ago, was accused of stirring up racial hatred in Rwanda in 1992. He is said to have delivered an inflammatory speech that touched off a wave of Hutu genocide against the Tutsi minority.

At his deportation hearing before Canada's Supreme Court, evidence was presented that Mugesera had urged Hutus to decapitate Tutsis.

"We were interveners in the Mugesera proceedings," said Novogrodsky, who branded him as a "human rights violator."

Along with the Canadian Jewish Congress and Human Rights Watch, the clinic brought to the court's attention the international criminal law definition of "incitement to genocide."

In response, Mugesera accused four individuals – Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Canadian Jewish Congress President Ed Morgan, Justice Rosalie Abella and her husband, Irving Abella, a York University history professor – of conspiring to deprive him of a fair hearing.

"It was a truly outrageous accusation," said Novogrodsky.

Recently, the Supreme Court threw out Mugesera's motion to halt proceedings against him, and now he faces the prospect of deportation.

The fact that Novogrodsky's clinic intervened in the Mugesera affair is hardly coincidental. Rwanda has been on his mind for at least a decade.

When the civil war in that African country broke out in 1993, Novogrodsky was a graduate student at Cambridge University studying international relations. As he watched the televised images of Hutus murdering Tutsis in cold blood, he was revolted and depressed.

The killing spree, he thought, was the most intense, state-sponsored atrocity of innocent civilians since the Holocaust.

After finishing his studies and submitting an award-winning thesis on the Oslo peace process, he decided to attend law school.

"I wanted to promote social justice and learn how to represent the world's most vulnerable people. I wanted to focus on the legal needs of individuals and groups and not on the relationship among sovereign states."

With these lofty ideas in mind, he attended the Yale Law School from 1994 to 1997. Upon graduation, he received the Robert L. Bernstein Fellowship in International Human Rights to promote human rights and the rule of law in the Horn of Africa.

Noah Novogrodsky

That enabled him to travel to Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, and sit on a foreign advisory committee drafting a constitution for that newly independent nation that had been part of Ethiopia.

"I developed great respect for the plucky spirit of Eritreans, and was quite taken with their effort to develop a constitution that captured the spirit of the revolution, enshrined respect for women and multiparty democracy and committed a poor country to social and economic rights."

When he was still in Asmara, a war between Eritrea and Ethiopia erupted, and Novogrodsky spent much of his time "advocating" for civilians who had been expelled from Ethiopia.

In keeping with his interest in promoting human rights, Novogrodsky was also co-chair of the Cambodian Genocide Justice Project.

He described it as an initiative to map and exhume the killing fields of the murderous Khmer Rouge regime and develop a mechanism for bringing the killers to justice.

Such crimes do not surprise him.

Novogrodsky believes that governments in many countries systematically abuse human rights. But with sufficient political will, he thinks, they can stop the torture, abuse and discrimination.

He is the son of Charles and Myra Novogrodsky. Charles is a management consultant and past president of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre. Myra teaches at York University's education department. "She developed much of the equity studies and Holocaust education material used in Toronto schools."

Nutrition in Action

Bernard Betel Centre members keep up with latest trends

You are what you eat – or, as members of the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living know, if you eat well, you can live better.

Dietitian Marlene Choleva

Through a partnership with Mount Sinai Hospital, the Betel Centre offers an array of nutrition services free to members, including individual nutrition counselling and lectures.

Dietitian Marlene Choleva, a geriatric nutrition specialist, has been at Mount Sinai for 14 years. She spends one day a week exclusively at the Betel Centre.

Her goal is to answer general concerns, but also to provide timely information. Hot topics recently: fad diets, symbolism of Chanukah foods, interpreting food labels, and nutrition myths.

"You'd be surprised how many seniors think skim milk is not as nutritious as whole milk," Choleva says, or even that seniors don't need milk. "They think it's just for kids." Yet seniors actually need up to 1500 mg of calcium a day to prevent bone loss; just one glass of skim milk meets 1/5 of this daily need.

Another myth: snacking between meals is bad – in fact, by keeping blood sugar levels even and preventing extreme hunger, a well-chosen snack, like fruit or whole-grain pretzels, goes a long way. She also often hears that nuts are high in fat. "It's true," she agrees, "but it's good fat."

Whether learning the difference between "good" and "bad" fats, exploring the DASH (Dietary Approaches to Stop Hypertension) diet or discovering the truth behind Atkins, South Beach or grapefruit diets, members enjoy keeping up with trends.

Nutrition services are an integral part of the Betel Centre's "wellness umbrella," along with fitness classes, psychology, holistic therapy and more, often at no cost to members.

According to Jessica Rossman, Health Promotions Coordinator at the Betel Centre, nutrition education is essential for keeping seniors active and healthy. "Dietary needs change over time…and all our information is focused on older adults."

For Choleva, the ultimate aim is "learning how to make better choices." Like understanding new government rules for food labeling: "what keywords to look for, or portion size, for example."

Even when it comes to convenience foods like TV dinners, often dangerously high in fats or sodium, Choleva says "some are better than others."

This knowledge can be helpful for the many men in their later years who are just starting to take responsibility for their own meals. Other issues for which members consult her: weight loss, blood pressure, diabetes, and "just healthy eating tips."

Choleva is happy to answer members' questions even without an appointment; they don't need a medical reason to stop by, either. "I'm here every Thursday; drop in if I'm available." To make an appointment, leave a message at (416) 225-2112, Ext 200.

London student becomes a Rhodes scholar

By HAILEY EISEN
Special to The CJN

With significant education, business and volunteer accomplishments already to her credit, Joelle Faulkner is looking around the corner for her next challenge.

"I'm still young," she says with a huge smile. "I don't know what I want to do forever."

No matter what her plans, this 20-year-old from London, Ont., aims to make a difference.

In November, Faulkner was granted a Rhodes scholarship – an award given to only two Ontarians and a total of 11 Canadians each year.

Faulkner is only the eighth University of Western Ontario student to receive a Rhodes scholarship since 1970.

This scholarship will send her to England where she will spend the next two to three years studying law at the University of Oxford.

Having nearly completed her degrees in both chemical engineering and business at Western, Faulkner is excited about moving on to the challenges of Oxford Law.

"I want to learn how to persuasively project my views," she says. "I have a thirst for knowledge and I'm looking forward to being part of Oxford's very academic environment."

But her professors at Western will miss her energy and drive. They hold her achievements in very high regard.

"I have no doubt whatsoever that Joelle is going to make a major impact in society," says Ian Holloway, dean of Western's faculty of law.

Holloway recalls that Faulkner approached him two years ago seeking special permission to take law classes. While this is not a normal practice because of the intense competition for space, he says that considering her convincing nature and strong academic record, the school agreed.

"Can you imagine it?" he says. "She got one of the highest marks in the class."

As a child, Faulkner's persistence and the encouragement she received from her brother helped her succeed.

Her mother recalls that at age 13, Faulkner and her older brother Benji developed a business plan to sell CDs at the performances of her youth theatre group. While her parents, Tommy and Norine Stern Faulkner, thought this plan might not work, they let their children believe anything was possible.

"And it was," says her mom. "Joelle and Benji made money selling the CDs and gave 25 per cent of the profits to the Original Kids Theatre company. It was a huge success."

Faulkner approaches the next step in her education with the same enthusiasm. She says her interest in studying law stems from her love of learning.

When she graduates, she hopes to run her own company with her brother.

"It will be a research centre," she says. "It will help to bring scientific ideas to application."

Joelle Faulkner

Currently Faulkner owns and operates a horticultural supply company called Compost King, which includes a bagged product line, Terra Preta, that is sold throughout Southern Ontario.

Faulkner demonstrates "the value of achieving a broad education to support her unparalleled natural curiosity, entrepreneurial spirit and thirst for challenges," said Franco Berruti, dean of engineering at UWO, in an e-mail interview.

But her intense dedication to academic and business success has not prevented her from getting involved with her community. Rhodes scholars are urged to consider public service as their highest aim.

"Community has always been an important part of my life," says Faulkner. "In London, the Jewish community acts as one big extended family."

Faulkner volunteers at various engagements as a motivational speaker, provides tutoring to first-year engineering students, teaches disabled skiers at London's Track Three Ski program and is a regular blood donor and recruiter for other blood donors.

She serves as a Tzedek Hillel co-chair on the executive committee of Western's Hillel, recently co-ordinating a Gift of Life bone marrow drive on campus. The 216 new donors registered made it the second largest drive on a campus across North America.

"Given my wonderfully positive experience working with Hillel here, I'm sure I'll go on to get involved at Oxford," Faulkner says.

"Joelle is an ideal model for campus leaders," says Naomi Mazer, associate director of London Jewish Campus Services. "Her commitment, creativity, and passion are inspirational for everyone she touches."

Bouncing up and down behind the desk in the Hillel office, Faulkner describes the experiences that lie ahead. "I'm so excited," she says, her whole face lighting up. "It will really be so much fun!"

IDF fires 34 reservists over evacuation refusal letter

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces Central Command CO Maj.-Gen. Moshe Kaplinski decided Sunday night to fire 34 reserve officers who signed a letter stating they would refuse military orders to evacuate settlements.

The officers dismissed include five lieutenant colonels and one major. The remaining 28 reserve officers will be summoned to the Binyamin Brigade and notified of their dismissal.

The five senior officers met Sunday morning with their brigade commander in a final effort to prevent their dismissal, but they did not agree to retract the letter in its entirety.

The signatories toned down their position last Friday after IDF Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon announced that any officer who fails to retract his signature would be stripped of his rank and ousted from the IDF. Ya'alon's hope is that firm action now will nip the right-wing refusal movement in the bud.

In an attempt to clarify their stance, the officers presented their brigade commander with a letter stating their reservations, in principle, regarding refusal of orders. However, the revised phrasing was apparently deemed to be an insufficient retraction.

The officers' letter, published last Thursday in Yediot Achronot, stated that four battalion commanders and 30 other officers, all residents of West Bank settlements who serve in the Ramallah-area regional defence brigade, declared that they would refuse an order to evacuate settlements.

Several hundred reserve officers and combat soldiers who live in settlements signed a counter-petition last Friday to protest the refusal of their fellow officers to carry out evacuation orders, Israel Radio reported.

The protest statement was signed by Col. Ben-Tzion Gruber, commander of a reserve armoured brigade; Lieut.-Col. Shayke El-Ami, head of the Etzion regional brigade command; and Motti Sklar, head of the Second Broadcasting Authority.

Gruber said their protest was a spontaneous response to the refusal of their fellow officers to carry out orders.

Despite the hard line the IDF is taking on refusal, the Yesha Rabbinic Council issued a statement last Thursday evening urging soldiers and officers to openly declare their opposition to the disengagement plan.

"The order to dismantle settlements goes against the laws of the Torah and human morality," said the statement by rabbis of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. "One should not assist this act."

The written statement was signed by rabbinic council chairman Rabbi Dov Lior, Rabbi Elyakim Levanon of Elon Moreh, Rabbi Dudkevitch of Yitzhar and Rabbi Shilo of Kedumim.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz also declared last Thursday that any officer who disrupted the IDF's operations in the territories – whether by refusal or by any other means, such as the soldier who interfered with an outpost evacuation near Yitzhar last Monday – should be stripped of his rank and possibly indicted.

"The legal tools [to deal with refusal] exist," Mofaz said during a discussion of the issue with senior army and police officers and legal officials. "All that is needed is to use them. I ask and demand that the legal establishment apply all the relevant articles of the law and be as activist as possible. The reality has changed, and there is no other way."

Public Security Minister Gideon Ezra told the meeting that settlers who lashed out at soldiers during evacuations should be deprived of their weapon licences. He also advocated putting some extremists in administrative detention, but Mofaz disagreed.

The IDF believes that right-wing activity had been particularly intensive in an effort to pressure United Torah Judaism into refusing to join the government coalition. However, with UTJ finally deciding to join the coalition last Wednesday, the army hoped the situation will soon calm down.

Nevertheless, last week's events – from the violent resistance to the evacuation of an outpost near Yitzhar last Monday to Thursday's letter in Yediot – have left senior officers worried.

"We're on the brink of an abyss," one officer told Ha'aretz. "When a central stream in Israeli society is near to refusing, this poses a real danger to the IDF, and even to the very existence of the state. Mass refusal is a step from which there is no return. Let's assume they refuse. What will we do after the disengagement? Set up private political armies, each of which will carry out the orders that it deems appropriate?"

Abbas must bring effective government to PA

Abbas will have to transfer the balance of power from the Palestine Liberation Organization – an organization that includes most Palestinian factions, including refugees abroad – to the executive branch of the Palestinian Authority.

Analysis

In other words, he will need to upgrade the Palestinian Authority into a state-in-the-making with an effective government after the past four years of intifadah violence have undone the strides the authority made during the years of the Oslo peace process.

The opportunity is there for thorough changes – the current PA cabinet, which is made up of 25 ministers, will resign immediately after the elections.

So far, Prime Minister Ahmed Qurei has kept his status as second-in- command. He and Abbas see eye to eye on relations with Israel, but their personal relations have been strained.

Other key figures such as Finance Minster Salam Fayyad, Foreign Affairs Minister Nabil Sha'ath and Saeb Erekat, who is in charge of negotiations with Israel, are likely to go along with Abbas and not pose difficulties.

Internal politics pose still another problem. Fatah is still the strongest party in the PLO, but it has gone through a number of crises in recent years as a result of tensions between the "Old Guard" leadership and the younger generation, whose most prestigious figure is Marwan Barghouti, serving a life sentence in an Israeli jail for his role in terrorist attacks.

The presidential race pushed aside the internal Fatah struggle, but it is likely to be renewed now.

"If there is no change in the internal composition of Fatah, the movement may split this year," cabinet minister Kadura Fares warned.

Trying to win the hearts of the younger generation, Abbas announced recently that internal Fatah elections would be held no later than August.

Abbas also faces the challenge of reforming the security forces. Internal rivalries in the Palestinian Authority allowed for the rise of local chieftains and a near-total breakdown in public order. One way to mend the situation will be for Abbas to rein in the number of competing security organizations.

The Palestinian Authority currently has 15 security organizations that often duplicate each other, and that together have an estimated 65,000 people on payroll.

Though Palestinian leaders often claim they don't have the manpower to crack down on terrorist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, the huge security forces give the Palestinian Authority one of the highest ratios of security personnel to citizens in the world.

Abbas will need to unify the disparate security organizations into three or four large ones. That still isn't ideal, but would be a far cry from the present state of near-anarchy.

Arafat used to encourage internal rivalries to strengthen his own position by preventing anyone from amassing power and emerging as a potential rival. Abbas doesn't have Arafat's charisma to repeat these tactics, nor would they serve his interest.

But he will need to take into account several strongmen who may prove troublesome if their political and professional aspirations are not fulfilled.

Among the key players are Rashid Abu Shbak, commander of the preventive security force – basically, the secret service – in the Gaza Strip; Jibril Rajoub, former commander of preventive security in the West Bank and presently Abbas' national security adviser; Tawfik Tirawi, head of military intelligence, and Abdel Razek Majaideh and Haj Ismail, Gaza Strip and West Bank commanders of the Palestinian national security forces, the largest PA military force, with 40,000 troops on its payroll.

One old-time supporter of Abbas is Mohammed Dahlan, the former preventive security head in the Gaza Strip. Dahlan currently is "unemployed" but still wields considerable influence in Gaza, and has a good chance to be incorporated into the new government.

Hamas is still the main opposition force. Its electoral power is estimated at 20 per cent, but its power on the street is sufficient to make Abbas' life miserable.

If Abbas wants a cease-fire agreement with Israel, he will need to reach an understanding with Hamas – though the Palestinian Authority is committed, under international agreements such as the Oslo accords and the "road map" peace plan, not to reach an understanding with Hamas but to eradicate it.

Abbas said during his campaign that he would never crack down on terrorists. Though Israel and the United States are likely to give Abbas time to consolidate his power, it's not clear that they will allow the Palestinian Authority to continue to reap diplomatic benefits before it makes good on its most basic peace process obligation.

"We came to the polls with no prejudice," said Sheik Hassan Yousef, leader of Hamas in the West Bank.

"Let's wait and see what he will do, and then we shall formulate our standing."

In the absence of radical Hamas leaders such as Sheik Ahmed Yassin and Abdul Aziz Rantissi – both killed last year by Israel – and after four years of the largely futile intifadah, Yousef's approach may become the predominant Hamas policy.

Though Hamas didn't endorse the elections and most likely will continue to oppose negotiations with Israel, it may reach an understanding with Abbas, provided that it is given a greater role in decision-making.

Traffic fatalities up

A total of 511 people were killed in traffic accidents in 2004 in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza, says a new report from the Israel Police department of traffic research. That represents an increase of 4.5 per cent over 2003, when 487 people were killed.

Gunmen strike Israelis

One Israeli was killed and four others were wounded Friday when Palestinian gunmen opened fire on an Israeli vehicle between the Tapuah and Migdalim junctions near Nablus. One of the wounded was listed in serious condition.

Qassam attacks continue

Palestinians continued firing Qassam rockets and mortar shells at Israeli targets in the western Negev Desert and the Gaza Strip. Five shells were fired at communities in Gaza on Friday. Palestinians also fired a Qassam rocket at an Israeli community in the western Negev. There were no casualties and no damage. Earlier in the week, the Israel Defence Forces killed seven Palestinians, some of them teens from the same family, when the army returned fire at a cell of terrorists that had launched Qassam rockets at Jews from a nearby orchard.

Poland seeks extradition

Poland has again asked Israel to extradite a man accused of retaliatory acts against Nazis after World War II. Polish prosecutors say they have amassed more evidence against Solomon Morel, a Jew who is accused of brutality at a postwar labour camp in southern Poland. Israeli officials were examining the request, the Daily Telegraph reported. Israel has refused Poland's prior requests. Morel, who fled to Israel from Poland in 1994 and lives in hiding in Tel Aviv, was imprisoned in Auschwitz as a young man.

Exports to Latin America up

Israeli exports to Latin America rose by 27 per cent in the first nine months of 2004, to $773 million (US). Exports to Brazil, the largest destination, totalled $351 million during that time, according to Aurora, a Spanish-language Israeli newspaper. Among major goods exported to Brazil are carved stones, minerals, and chemical and petrochemical products.

Israelis aid tsunami victims

Israelis have flocked to a Magen David Adom drive to help victims of the Asian tsunami. More than 4,000 staff and volunteers from the Israeli relief agency went to Israeli supermarkets last week on a 48-hour drive to collect food and provisions to be sent to affected areas. The drive was originally scheduled for two days, but was extended to four after an "incredible" response, said Yoni Yagodovsky, the agency's international director. So far, the ambulance service has collected 2.5 tons of flour, 920 tons of rice, 920 quarts of oil, 1.5 tons of pasta and 40,000 quarts of mineral water.

Turkish foreign minister visits Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul met with senior Israeli officials last week in Jerusalem and expressed his country's desire to take part in the peace process.

Political sources in Jerusalem said Gul did not make progress in efforts to bring back the remains of executed Israeli spy Eli Cohen from Syria. Gul brought no new message from Damascus, although he said he believed Syria would be willing to make gestures if progress was made in peace talks.

Gul's visit was part of an effort to improve Turkish-Israeli ties after a chill caused when Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan accused Israel last year of engaging in state terrorism against Palestinians. Gul's visit comes ahead of an expected visit by Erdogan, the first since he took office in 2003.

"There is a new atmosphere and hope and it must be exploited," Gul said.

In his talks with officials, he stressed the importance of co-operation with Israel on advanced technology and the war on terror. "Co-operation is important for both sides," he said.

Gul called on Israel to accept the new Palestinian leadership, to release Palestinian prisoners and to move ahead on disengagement.

Former Foreign Ministry director general Alon Liel, now chairman of the Israel-Turkey commercial council, said he believed Turkey is seeking to improve relations with Israel. However, he added, Ankara was "looking with one eye at Israel and with the other at relations in the region, including with the Palestinians."

Shalom said he was unable to accede to Gul's request to increase the quota for Turkish construction workers because of unemployment in Israel, but if the overall number of foreign workers is increased, Turkish workers would be preferred.

As a gesture to Turkey, Israel's ambassador to Ankara, Pimi Avivi, announced during Gul's visit that Israelis would be allowed to invest in Turkish-controlled northern Cyprus, a break from previous policy.

Officials in the Turkish entourage stressed to reporters that, from a diplomatic perspective, the Palestinians took priority over the Israelis on the visit, noting that Gul would be speaking to the Palestinian parliament and not to the Knesset.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — A United Nations official called for restraint following Sunday's border clashes in which an Israel Defence Forces (IDF) officer, a UN peacekeeper and a Hezbollah militant were killed in southern Lebanon.

"We are asking all sides to contain their actions and to control their actions on the ground," said Staffan de Mistura, the UN's special representative for south Lebanon.

"We are in a very delicate period not only in the history of Lebanon but of the region. The whole region is going through a difficult moment. This is the time to maintain calm. This is the time not to go into escalation," de Mistura said.

De Mistura made the remarks after a meeting with Lebanese Foreign Minister Mahmoud Hammoud to discuss the developments that followed the explosion of a roadside bomb planted by Lebanese-based Hezbollah guerrillas in the Har Dov region of the northern border with Lebanon.

An IDF officer was killed when an armoured jeep hit the explosive device during an army patrol, and several other soldiers from the Golani infantry brigade were injured.

The officer, Capt. Sharon Elmakayis from Atlit, near Haifa, was severely wounded in the blast and died of his injuries a short time later.

In a statement faxed to Associated Press, Hezbollah said the bomb attack targeted an IDF patrol on the road to the Zebdin border post and that an IDF jeep was "directly hit."

The Hezbollah statement added that the attack was "within the framework of our efforts to liberate the remainder of Lebanese lands under occupation in the Shaba Farms area."

Following the incident, IDF soldiers engaged in heavy exchanges of fire with Hezbollah guerrillas along the northern border, Israel Radio reported.

Israel launched air strikes and shelled Hezbollah positions, killing one militiaman and wounding another.

A UN patrol car was hit by an Israeli tank shell, killing a French truce monitor and wounding a Swedish officer and a Lebanese man.

The French Defence Ministry in Paris identified the dead officer as Maj. Jean Louis Valet, who was serving with UN Observer Group Lebanon, a UN unit that that monitors the 1948 armistice between Lebanon and Israel.

Israel blamed Syria for the upsurge in violence and also said it would protest to the UN against Lebanon over the attack. The exchanges of fire come after more than six months of quiet in the Har Dov region.

Nearly 300 UN peacekeepers have died in the region, most of them since an armed peacekeeping force was deployed to the border region in 1978.

A senior Israeli military officer who investigated the incident acknowledged Monday that the death of the French peacekeeper "apparently is the result of our tank's fire.

"My impression is that there was no way of knowing that these were UN soldiers," he told Associated Press in Jerusalem.

"They were in uniform but had no identifying signs to show that they were from the UN and were very close to the to the area where the incident occurred."

However, Lebanese security officials said Monday that the UN soldiers were on a routine patrol when the Israelis opened fire on them.

"They were in a clearly marked white UN patrol vehicle flying the UN flag. The wore their [blue] helmets," said the security officials speaking on condition of anonymity.

The Palestinian Authority suffered considerable economic damage in four years of intifadah. Though it has received billions of dollars in foreign aid, much of it went to terrorism and corruption, leaving the authority with a meager $19 million U.S. in its bank accounts and needs that exceed $135 million U.S., according to Fayyad.

Analysis

The hope is that in a stable post-election era, international donors will again open their wallets.

Another major challenge is widespread corruption in the civil service. For the past eight years, various reports have shown that senior PA figures have stolen millions of dollars in public funds.

Al-Juabi of Bir-Zeit University said Abbas needs to grant the judicial system greater powers and freedom from external pressure to allow a strong hand against corruption and stabilize the rule of law.

Most analysts predict that given the complexity of the challenges he faces, Abbas can't win on all fronts. It's expected that he will prefer to stabilize the internal Palestinian situation, even at the cost of postponing possible progress in negotiations with Israel.

Abbas' next electoral challenge will be parliamentary elections scheduled for June. By then, he must be strong enough to make sure that the Hamas opposition is contained.

Will the gray leader meet the challenge? On the face of it, chances are slim, but precedent gives reason for optimism.

When Anwar Sadat took over as Egyptian president after the death of the flamboyant Gamal Abdel Nasser, he also was described as a weak successor – but eventually emerged from Nasser's shadow to become one of the legendary leaders of the Arab world.

Israeli founds breast cancer centre after daughter's death

By ERIN SILVER
Special to the CJN

As each brick is laid and the inaugural day draws near, Joel Feldschuh gets closer to keeping Israeli families together.

Since his daughter, Meirav Shamir, died of breast cancer two years ago at age 28, Feldschuh has been on a mission to build the largest, most advanced and comprehensive breast cancer centre in Israel, named in honour of Shamir.

"Meirav was a vital young woman," says Feldschuh, on the telephone from his home in Israel. "She had everything to live for – her husband, two children, and family. She had a nurturing spirit with not only an optimistic outlook on life, but a fierce desire to live it to the fullest. The challenge now is to continue with life and help others," says Feldschuh.

Thankfully, he is getting some support from his friends in Canada. The Canadian Friends of the Israel Cancer Association (CFICA) is issuing tax receipts to Canadians who contribute to the centre, and a group of individuals is getting together to plan how they can help in the new year.

"Mr. Feldschuh believes that had such a centre existed years ago, his daughter would still be alive today," says Doron Opher, president of CFICA. "It's an excellent cause."

CFICA knows that women in Israel are in particular need of help. The risk of breast cancer is especially high for Ashkenazi Jewish women. Among these women, 12 to 15 per cent carry a specific mutation in the gene for breast cancer – an extraordinarily high rate. This year in Israel alone, 4,000 women will be diagnosed with the disease. According to the Israel Cancer Association, one of eight women in Israel has a chance of getting breast cancer in their life span. If detected early, about 90 per cent survive.

Women in Canada get their test results back right away and have access to top breast cancer treatment facilities, such as the Marvelle Koffler Breast Cancer Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital and the Princess Margaret Hospital, both in Toronto. The situation in Israel is different.

"I realized that the problem in Israel is that once a woman gets a diagnosis, there is no centre where she can go to get all the information, advice and treatment about her condition," says Feldschuh, who has become an unwilling expert about the flaws inherent in the Israel medical system. Shamir died in 2002, three months after her 28th birthday, after her cancer was detected too late. His wife, Smadar, has faced cancer twice.

"Women are in such fear of the disease and so turned off by the horror stories of the bureaucratic medical system that they opt for the ostrich approach and don't seek help in time," says Feldschuh.

Adding to the fear is the fact that women in Israel do not get their breast cancer test results back for 10 days to two weeks. "This is unheard of in other democratic societies," says Feldschuh. "Women in Israel need a central centre that will encourage early detection, provide them with quick answers and ensure they get back their test results quickly. The best services should be available for women."

Feldschuh, who headed Israeli Air Force intelligence during the Gulf War and has served as CEO of Al El Airlines, is just the man for the job. He is raising money to build the Meirav Breast Cancer Center at the renowned Sheba Medical Center in Ramat Gan. So far, he has raised $250,000 U.S. on his own and recruited Israel's top doctors to carry out his vision.

The Meirav Center will house examination rooms, a laboratory, a library/resource centre, a conference room and a seminar room. The facility will be inaugurated in May 2005, cost more than $1.4 million to build, and take an additional $50,000 to $75,000 to operate each year.

"The Meirav Center will endeavour to reach out to women from their 20s onward, particularly those with a family history, a prior diagnosis, and those not under regular medical observation, including women in Bnei Brak, Israel's largest ultra-orthodox community," says Feldschuh. Though he doesn't know whether early detection would have spared Shamir's life, "early detection is one of the weapons we can use to wage war on this ravaging disease," he says.

"The Meirav Center provides a singular opportunity to actually do something about breast cancer, and in this way, enhance the quality of life and longevity of a population of women who are largely left 'out of the loop' of comprehensive breast care," says Feldschuh.

"It is important that Meirav's untimely and tragic death not be in vain. It is up to us to move decisively beyond fretting and dreading the disease, to detecting and treating it successfully. Breast cancer can be beaten – it has been proven time and time again.

"Help us ensure that the women of Israel can avail themselves of the most modern state-of-the-art multidisciplinary approach to this disease. Make the Meirav Center a reality, and give the gift of life."

WHY MOSES?
based on the Midrash

The blazing sun beat down on Moses' head as he led the sheep through the desert. Years ago, on a day like this, he would be inside the palace, relaxing on a sofa swathed with silk as the royal servants fanned him with enormous palm leaves. But that was in the past. Now he was a fugitive, sentenced to death by Pharaoh himself, for the crime of murder.

He didn't regret it. The slavedriver he had killed was beating a Jewish slave to death. Killing the slavedriver was the only way Moses could have saved his brother. Because even though Moses grew up as an Egyptian prince, he knew he was adopted. He knew he was a Jew. And all Jews are brothers.

He escaped to Midian. There he had married, and now the former prince was a shepherd for his father-in-law's sheep. Unlike the other shepherds in the area who let their sheep graze in fields that did not belong to them, Moses led his flocks deep into the wilderness. There they could eat from grass that belonged to nq one but God. Alone with only the sheep, Moses had plenty of time for quiet contemplation while the animals grazed. He thought about the horrible suffering of his brothers in Egypt. And he wondered when God would redeem His people.

A pained bleat caught his attention, and Moses looked up just in time to see a single lamb break through the herd and dash off into the desert. Knowing the other sheep would be all right if he left them there, Moses tore after it. On and on he chased it, through gaping ravines, across vast stretches of sand, until the sheep stopped at a small stream at the foot of a mountain. Thirstily, it lapped up the water.

"Oh, so that's the problem," Moses said. "You're thirsty. Why didn't you tell me? I must have taken you away from the water hole before you had enough. I'm sorry. Next time, I'll give you more time to drink."

God looked down at Moses – Moses, who could care for a whole flock of sheep, yet not overlook even one of them. He would be the ideal leader for the Jewish nation. He could take them out of Egypt and lead them to the promised land.

And as Moses waited for the lamb to finish drinking, he noticed a thorn-bush engulfed in flames on top of the mountain. Strangely, even though the flames raged over the thorny branches, the bush didn't burn up. Moses approached to see what was going on, and he heard the voice of an angel speaking to him from the bush.

"Moses, Moses... take off your shoes, for you are standing on holy ground."

And then Moses heard the voice of God: "I am the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and I have seen the suffering of my people in Egypt... and I am sending you to bring my people, the Jews, out of Egypt."

Toronto actor found playing Morgentaler 'fascinating'

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

Actor David Eisner said playing Dr. Henry Morgentaler in a recent CTV movie was very fascinating, and he was surprised to discover some commonalities in their histories.

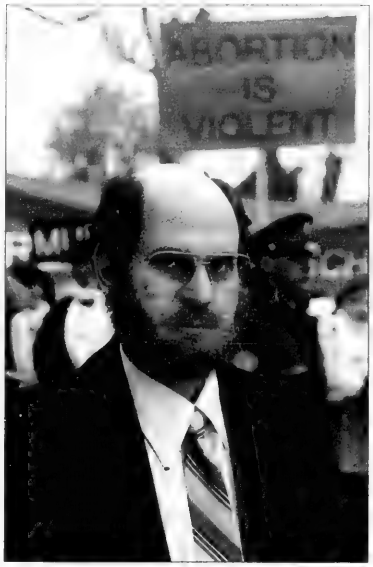
"He's quite different than I imagined," says Eisner. "He's a Holocaust survivor, like my dad is, and I used some of this [in my portrayal], certainly."

Morgentaler and his brother were the only two members of their family to survive Auschwitz – Morgentaler eventually immigrated to Canada in 1950 – as did Eisner's father and uncle. "They're both from Poland too. So there's a connection there."

Eisner, a prolific Toronto-born actor who's appeared in over 50 television and feature film productions, sat down with director John L'Ecuyer, to discuss how to portray Morgentaler, for the television movie Choice: The Henry Morgentaler Story.

"[The film] is really four or five movies in one," says Eisner. Morgentaler, who enjoys the Jewish culture, is a self-proclaimed secular humanist. He's a Holocaust survivor, and "he was also quite a womanizer," which many people might not know. Knowing he would be incriminated for his actions, he willingly put his freedom at risk and was jailed for his commitment to his cause; he suffered a heart attack while in prison.

Morgentaler is best known as the pro-choice activist who defied the Quebec government by turning his Montreal family practice into a family planning clinic that also conducted abortions. In 1973, he performed an abortion which aired on the CTV current affairs program W5. After the show aired on Mother's Day of that year, his clinic was raided and he was brought to trial. Although the jury acquitted him, the Quebec Court of Appeal, in an unprecedented move, reversed the verdict, and Morgentaler was sent to jail for 18 months.



David Eisner as Dr. Henry Morgentaler

Eisner also points to another intriguing thread in Morgentaler's life that adds to the complexity of his persona. While in the concentration camps, he had to struggle to not be noticed, to remain invisible. As a family practitioner, he was also extremely inconspicuous. Then, suddenly, he formed an unshakable commitment to a cause, and had to step into the limelight. "To do that, to make a difference, he had to stand out. Very brave," says Eisner.

"Playing Dr. Henry Morgentaler was the most challenging, creative, and inspiring work I've ever done. What a gift to have the opportunity to be part of this important Canadian story."

This isn't Eisner's first meaty role. He broke into acting in Grade 12, when he appeared in a few episodes of The King of Kensington. While appearing on the CBC series Hangin' In between 1980 and 1987, Eisner divided his time between Canada and Los Angeles, acting in such shows as Highway to Heaven. He's worked consistently ever since; most recently, he appeared in Good Will Hunting, and appears on the TV series Blue Murder, now in its fourth season.

Eisner says playing real people, and especially such larger-than-life figures, presents its unique challenges. "I enjoy playing real people. It has a little added dimension and pressure, but it's a fun challenge. You don't try to do a rich impression, it's more trying to capture the spirit of the person. I tried not to handcuff myself by mimicking [Morgentaler], but more figuring out what he is all about as a person."

Not an easy feat, but more than worth it for someone who has always known acting is his true vocation. "Actors are a courageous group because there's so much rejection, you get more rejection than most people do in a lifetime. But if you love it you just move on to the next thing," says Eisner.

Criminal lawyer Eddie Greenspan subject of CBC biopic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Eddie Greenspan, a brilliant cross-examiner with a deadly mouth, is regarded as one of Canada's finest criminal lawyers.

Greenspan, who hates to lose, has represented some of Canada's most notorious defendants, from convicted wife murderer Peter Demeter to disgraced press baron Conrad Black.

His career is the subject of A Criminal Mind: The Life and Times of Eddie Greenspan, an informative documentary by Barry Avrich to be broadcast on CBC Television on Jan. 20 at 7 p.m.

Avrich portrays the Falstaffian Greenspan as a smart, larger-than-life workaholic whose raison d'être is his work.

Born in Niagara Falls, Ont, in 1944, he was a member of a close-knit family that struggled with poverty. "We had no money, though I don't remember deprivation," Greenspan recalls.

His father, Joseph, dreamed of being a criminal lawyer, but died of a heart attack at 42, leaving his quest unfulfilled and his family shattered.

On the night of his father's passing, Greenspan found a book about Clarence Darrow, the great American lawyer, and was smitten.

Greenspan's role model was Perry Mason, the rumpled lawyer of American television fame. Never distracted from his goal, Greenspan graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in 1968. His younger brother, Brian, who appears in the biopic, also became a lawyer.

Greenspan is absolutely dedicated to his profession, as his Moroccan wife, Suzy, attests. On their first trip after their marriage, his bedside reading was the Criminal Code. "The law is his mistress," she says. "He loves me, too."

Greenspan agrees with her assessment. "The law was first. She was a close second."

Such was his dedication that he took family dinners in downtown restaurants so that he could quickly return to his office, his daughter, Juliana, a criminal lawyer as well, recalls.

Eddie Greenspan

He joined a Toronto law firm, but struck out on his own after a dispute with his boss. Since then, his clients have included Helmuth Boxbaum, who was convicted of killing his wife; Gerald Regan, the scandal-ridden former premier of Nova Scotia, and Garth Drabinsky, the embattled theatre mogul.

A junk food addict who regularly works 18-hour days, Greenspan revels in the intricacies of law, as Black observes.

George Jonas, who collaborated with him in the making of the CBC-TV series Scales of Justice, compares him to a hunter in the woods who can read all the signs.

But critics claims he manipulates the media. "He does attract headlines," Diane Francis, a journalist, comments. "He's a showboat, the Johnny Cochrane of Canada."

Still others accuse him of "pocketbook justice." And though Greenspan argues that rich clients are not better off than poor ones, he concedes that the criminal justice system is less than perfect.

If there is one single cause that animates him, it is capital punishment. Greenspan hates it and once took off six months to campaign against it across Canada.

He describes capital punishment as "state revenge by execution" and contends it has had no impact on Canada's homicide rate.

A Criminal Mind neatly summarizes the arc of his life, but is marred by a few yawning gaps. What did his father do for a living? How did the Greenspans manage after his sudden and untimely death? How many cases has he lost? What is his philosophy of the law?

Despite these oversights, this is a satisfactory biopic.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 18. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can alse be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Journalism grad publishes cutting-edge teen magazine

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

While most young graduates are just getting comfortable in their new desk jobs, one Ryerson grad has decided to take on the world of teen magazines.

Nicole Cohen, an ex-Winnipegger and journalism grad, is the driving force behind Shameless, a new progressive magazine aimed at teen girls. Unlike Seventeen magazine and Cosmo Girl, which focus on beauty, fashion and how to get a guy, Shameless concentrates on what it's really like to be a teen girl, with stories about sex, important women and independent music. It's only been six months since its launch, but the magazine has already received heaps of praise, including being named best new magazine in NOW's 2004 readers poll.

Cohen, who is also a staff writer for Eye Weekly and a part-time political science student at York University, wasn't looking to become co-editor and co-publisher of a popular new publication. In fact, Shameless began as a school assignment.

"Shameless started as a project in my fourth-year advanced editing class at Ryerson," says Cohen. "We were given an assignment to create a magazine that didn't exist but should."

Cohen and her class partner, and now co-publisher Melinda Mattos, thought a magazine for teens would be an interesting idea, but they didn't want to emulate what was already on the market.

"We wanted to create a magazine that took teenage girls more seriously than just as a lucrative market to sell beauty products to," says Cohen. "We thought we could do something really independent, something smart and something fun."

Honing this idea was easy – all Cohen needed to do was look at her own experiences with teen magazines.

"Melinda and I had always read teen magazines because they were marketed to us and that's all there was to read," she says. "We were always frustrated with them because we find teen magazines talk down to girls and they treat them like stupid people who need to be told how to be pretty, how to be popular and how to look a certain way."

Cohen adds that most glossy teen magazines teach girls to be "ashamed of their sexuality and ashamed of their mind and ashamed of themselves and then they try and sell you something to make you feel better."

After graduating from Ryerson in 2003, Cohen decided to take Shameless out of the classroom and into the real world. It was a large undertaking, but Cohen and Mattos pulled it off. The entire operation is volunteer, with friends and eager writers and artists lending their services. Since they launched the magazine in June 2004, its pool of contributors has grown, with last issue's cover story written by a freelance writer from New York. Cohen says that all the unpaid help is proof that Shameless can succeed.

"It shows that our magazine is viable because there are so many different ideas out there. Everybody is working for free, even us. We started with no money and we've been fundraising as we go along."

Although she's only 24, Cohen's not new to the world of independent media. After leaving Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Grade 11, she went to the University of Winnipeg, where she took journalism classes and eventually began writing for the U of W student paper in university. She moved to Toronto in 1999 and started writing for Ryerson's Eyeopener, where she was both arts and features editor. While in school she freelanced for the Toronto Star, Broken Pencil and Horizon, and worked at Canadian Press. It was the experiences working for independent publications that really made an impression on her.

"I always enjoyed reporting and writing and editing for the student paper," says Cohen. "I like being able to have a voice and give people who aren't normally vocal a voice. So I've tended to write for independent or alternative media. I like the ability to challenge ideas."

With Shameless, Cohen is not only challenging teen girls' ideas about themselves, but also the teen magazine market, and she's doing it on a fraction of what big budget magazines spend.

"We spend about $4,000 a magazine, but we can still create a high quality product," says Cohen, whose team has already sold more than 400 subscriptions.

Cohen does admit that taking on the million-dollar glossies isn't her motivation or immediate goal – she publishes Shameless to give teen girls a choice, she says.

"We're trying to give girls an option and an alternative. They can pick up Teen People and read all the gossip and they can pick up Shameless and read about real issues facing teenage girls."

Shameless' third issue comes out in February.

Historian examines Red Cross role during Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The International Committee of the Red Cross, founded in 1863 in Geneva, Switzerland, as a non-governmental humanitarian organization, was sorely tested in World War II, when soldiers and civilians were exposed to unimaginable deprivation and sudden death.

How did the Red Cross, a neutral organization based in a neutral nation, acquit itself? More to the point, to what extent did the Red Cross help Jews during the Holocaust?

Jean-Claude Favez, a historian who dipped into the archives of the Red Cross, deals with these lingering issues in The Red Cross and the Holocaust, published by Cambridge University Press.

One of the first questions he addresses is the degree to which the Red Cross was aware of German atrocities against Jews.

During the war, Geneva was a listening post and a hive of intrigue, one of the few places where representatives of the belligerents could meet. In light of this, numerous groups, ranging from the Quakers to the World Jewish Congress, established branch offices there.

Their efforts were not in vain. Gerhard Riegner, the representative of the World Jewish Congress, came into possession of explosive evidence about the Holocaust, which he relayed to the Allies.

The Red Cross maintained close links with these organizations and was thus privy to their respective intelligence. As a result, the Red Cross was familiar with the Nazi deportations of Jews. Indeed, Red Cross officials even visited a number of concentration camps, including Buchenwald in 1940.

By 1942, the Red Cross was able to conclude that masses of Jews were being shipped to death camps in Poland. But according to Favez, the Red Cross did not yet grasp "the full extent of the tragedy." By 1943, however, all its doubts about Nazi intentions vanished.

On April 13 of that year, Roland Marti, a Red Cross official, reported that only 1,400 Jews were left in Berlin, and that they would soon be evacuated to Auschwitz and ghettos in Riga, Lublin, Pless and Reval.

Ominously, he added: "There is no news or trace of the 10,000 Jews who left Berlin… and who are now presumed dead."

From the second half of 1943, information about the Holocaust at the disposal of the Red Cross increased both in quality and quantity.

Favez cites two examples.

By February 1944, Carl Burckhardt, a leading Red Cross official, knew that the vast majority of Polish Jews had been exterminated.

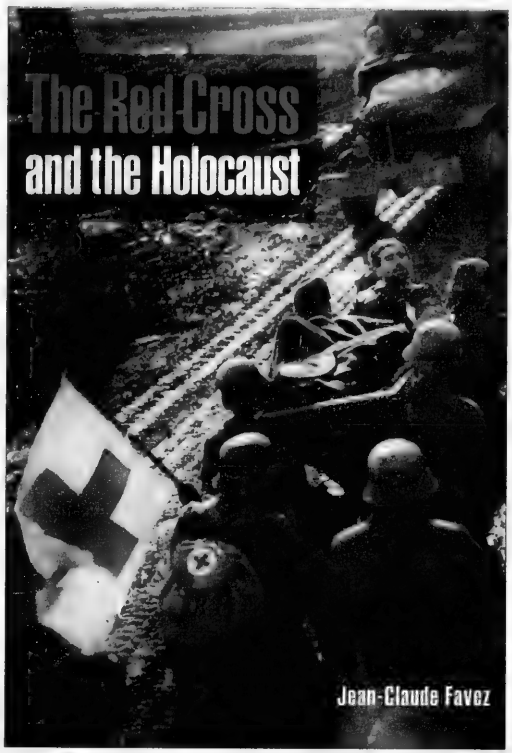
What did the Red Cross do with this mountain of evidence, which strongly suggested that a monstrous crime of unprecedented proportions was unfolding?

Not being able to rescue Jews because it embraced Germany's view that the "Jewish problem" was a purely internal matter, the Red Cross tried to help with consignments of food, clothing and medicine. This assistance, extended to Jews in Poland, France, Italy, Holland, Latvia, Slovakia and Slovenia, was invaluable.



Malnutrition and overcrowding were common in concentration camps and ghettos. But in the face of these revelations, the Red Cross acted with extreme restraint and caution, being convinced that any direct gesture would be futile, even counter-productive. Nevertheless, the Red Cross tried to alleviate the problem.

Marcel Junod, a Red Cross official in Poland, met with Hans Frank, the Nazi proconsul, and discussed the possibility of an aid operation. As well, Junod held talks with Adam Czerniakow, the doomed chairman of the Jewish Council of Elders in Warsaw.

In Belgium and Holland, the Red Cross could undertake only limited action on behalf of Jews and political prisoners.

The Red Cross delegate in Greece, Rene Burckhardt, based in Salonika, was not content with merely sending reports and arranging food supplies. Amid the deportations, he actually protested. But under German pressure, he was recalled to Geneva.

Like Burckhardt, Julius Schmidlin, the Red Cross representative in Croatia, did what he could to help Jews. When the leaders of Zagreb's Jewish community were arrested in 1944, he lobbied the ministry of interior for their release, and succeeded.

Favez speculates that Mihai Antonescu, the Romanian strongman, co-operated out of fear. He thought that he would be prosecuted for having collaborated with the Germans.

Favez suggests that the Red Cross in Bulgaria persuaded the government not to deport Bulgarian Jewish citizens. But he assigns too much weight to its influence in Sofia.

Bulgarian cabinet ministers, clergymen and members of the intelligentsia had already decided to protect the Jewish community.

There is no evidence that that Red Cross played any significant role in rescuing Bulgarian Jews. Certainly, the Red Cross could not save the Jews of Bulgarian-occupied Thrace and Macedonia from being deported.

Frederic Born, the Red Cross delegate in Budapest, Hungary, chafed over head office requirements to maintain strict political neutrality. He asked for permission to persuade Hungarian authorities to show less zeal in the application of anti-Jewish legislation.

"I know the extraordinary difficulties facing the [Red Cross], but the idea of standing by helplessly, powerless to do anything, is almost impossible to bear," Born wrote with some anguish.

Toward the close of 1944, when hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews had already been murdered, he and other Red Cross officials intervened frequently on behalf of the remaining Jews of Budapest. They supplied them with food, clothing and shelter and were instrumental in finding Jews who had gone missing.

During the last year of the war, the Red Cross played an important role in delivering basic foodstuffs and medicines to the survivors of camps in Germany – Theresienstadt, Dachau, Mauthausen, Ravensbruck and Oranienburg-Sachsenhausen.

In conclusion, Favez concedes that the Red Cross did not always perform nobly. The reason, he claims, is that it was not accustomed to dealing with a ruthless totalitarian state such as Nazi Germany.

On the basis of the facts he marshals in this book, a work of important scholarship marred by leaden writing, the Red Cross did what it could under very difficult circumstances.

Sports team owner committed to Jewish causes

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

One of Larry Tanenbaum's most vivid memories as a young boy growing up in Toronto is cheering on his beloved hockey team at Maple Leaf Gardens. Today, as part of the team's ownership group, he can saunter into the club's home rink whenever he wants – a prospect that still amazes him.

When he was appointed chair of Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment back in July 2003, Tanenbaum became one of the country's most powerful sports figures, heading the company that owns the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Toronto Raptors and their home, the Air Canada Centre.

Tanenbaum is a minority owner with a 13 per cent stake, but he is the only individual who owns company stock.

Like the rest of the hockey-viewing public, the 59-year-old businessman has no NHL games to attend this year. The lockout has seen to that. But he remains a courtside fixture with his wife Judy at Raptors games that don't fall on Friday nights. (This season, nine of the club's 41 home dates are on Shabbat.)

"Friday nights are spent at home with my wife, [three] children, and grandchildren," Tanenbaum said in an interview at his downtown office, where he serves as chair and chief executive officer of Kilmer Van Nostrand, an international investment holding company.

"The only exception is for playoffs, when we have Shabbat dinner very early."

Tanenbaum grew up in a traditional, kosher home at a time when a lot of the barriers to Jews were falling.

His parents, Max and Anne, committed Zionists, were very active in community affairs during his childhood, chairing United Jewish Appeal campaigns in the 1960s, a role Tanenbaum himself performed in 1998.

Max was in the steel business and donated the commodity to synagogues that were constructed in the 1950s and 1960s. The Tanenbaums became members of half a dozen shuls in Toronto as payment for the steel that went into them.

While his parents were legendary for their philanthropy, Tanenbaum says his belief in giving back to the community stems from his grandfather Abraham, who founded the Darcy Street Talmud Torah, the forerunner to today's Eitz Chaim Schools.

Tanenbaum recently donated $1 million to Birthright Israel, a program he strongly believes in.

"The idea that every young Jewish adult can experience Israel at no cost to them has to be an incredible statement on the future of the Jewish community's connection to Israel," he said.

Tanenbaum is actively involved in numerous community ventures. He serves as vice-chair of Mount Sinai Hospital's board of directors. He's a board member of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, among many others.

He hopes to lead a mission to Israel in the spring or fall of 2005.

In the meantime, Tanenbaum's mission in hockey is to bring the Stanley Cup back to Toronto for the first time since 1967, while also getting the Raptors back on track toward their first NBA championship.

He was instrumental in bringing professional basketball to Toronto, first by attempting to move already established franchises to the city and then initiating the expansion process that opened the league's eyes to Canada.

As head of the Palestra Group, he was unsuccessful in landing the franchise, but he did make a name for himself in NBA circles, which proved to be beneficial down the road.

While leading Toronto to an NBA title would be great, Tanenbaum said, nothing would compare for the city's long-suffering sports fans to seeing the Stanley Cup.

"I want, before I leave this business, to make sure we've brought it back to Toronto not just once, but many times," he said enthusiastically. "That's my goal.

"I take everything in five-year increments. I still have another four years to run on that, so let's see how we do after the end of five years."

Cantor re-signs with the Argos

All-star nose tackle Noah Cantor has extended his contract with the Grey Cup champion Toronto Argonauts for two more seasons, the football club announced last week.

Cantor, a native of Ottawa, had a career year with the Argos in 2004. He set a career high for quarterback sacks in a season with 10, which placed him first on the club and third in the CFL. He also finished with a career-high eight passes knocked down, good for second on the team.

"If I have only a couple of years left to play football, I want to actually enjoy them. And the most fun I've had playing is in Toronto," Cantor, 33, told the National Post.

The extension will take him into the first season in which the Argos are scheduled to play at their new stadium to be built at York University.

"I think any time you got a guy like Noah, who's been a very consistent player throughout his career, you've got to be happy that you can sew him up for a length of time," said Adam Rita, Toronto's vice-president of football operations.

Cantor has played on four Grey Cup champions, winning Canadian football's top prize three times with the Argos – in 1996, 1997 and 2004 – and once with the B.C. Lions in 2000.

The Argos are North America's oldest professional football club, having celebrated their 130th anniversary in 2003. They've won the Grey Cup 15 times.

TIBERIAS MARATHON: Nearly 700 competitors took part last week in the 28th International Tiberias Marathon on the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Habtamu Bekele of Ethiopia finished first for the second consecutive year, clocking in a time of 2:18:08 in the 42.2 km (26.2 mile) race. Assaf Bimero came first among Israelis, claiming the Israeli championship in a time of 2:20:02. The women's event was won for the second year in a row by Israel's Nili Abramski, in 2:44:49. Strong winds made the 28th marathon one of the slowest in years.

Sticking to just one piece of cake

By SANDIE BENITAH

They say there's a little bit of truth in every joke, and these days, when I joke about never wanting to get married, I'm telling the truth.

At work recently, my editor suggested that we do a story about a new reality show being based on the Ashley Madison Agency – a local dating service that targets committed couples and urges them to give in to the natural temptations of infidelity.

Ladies and gentlemen, good news! Apparently, there's no need to strive for goodness anymore. Even cheaters have their place in our tolerant and free society.

I'm sick to my stomach, not only because some goon is making a financial killing on other people's heartache, but because I'm also no fool.

People aren't going to start cheating now that Ashley's in town – they've been doing it long before she showed up. We've all made stupid mistakes, me included. The difference is that before, we were made to feel ashamed about our weakness and disgusted with ourselves for hurting others. Now, we're going to be celebrities.

Looks like the Black Eyed Peas had it right with their catchy song Where is the Love? Divorce and cheating used to be taboo, but now it seems that marriage and lifelong commitments are socially unacceptable.

Everyone from Ashley Madison to Brad Pitt has called infidelity a natural urge, but I refuse to give in to my whims. Cheating, like everything else in life, is a choice we make, and it's time we took responsibility for our choices instead of letting commercial perverts define what are, and aren't, acceptable human traits.

Call me young and naïve, but I'd like to think that love – both loving and wanting to be loved – is more of an innate human characteristic than my own immorality.

Sure, we've all looked at the cutie walking past us or smiled back at the flirty co-worker, but some of us have taken it further, and we shouldn't be celebrated for it or coddled into thinking that it's OK. We should salvage whatever pride we have left and take responsibility for our shortcomings.

What kind of people are we if we don't?

A long time ago, an old friend of mine spoke about the challenges of becoming Orthodox and explained that it is much harder to be good than to be bad.

The hardest thing for me was realizing just how easy it is to be bad. I thought that cheating on someone would be a tormenting experience, but as disgusting as I feel admitting this, it wasn't at all. It's a sad fact that cheating is frightfully easy to do these days, and if nobody finds out, then it's the best piece of cake you've ever had and eaten, too.

Years later, that cake is giving me indigestion.

It's a true test of character to stay loyal and faithful to your partner, whether you've been with them for 10 days or 10 years. Sometimes, it's easier to choose the route where everybody gets what they want and nobody gets hurt, but in the end, even if nobody is the wiser, you always have to face yourself in the mirror.

I can look into that mirror now, and I envision myself married one day, completely in love but sometimes drooling over some Justin Timberlake lookalike. I'm just a girl, after all. But I'm also a woman who's grown up a lot since her boy-crazy days, and I won't make the same mistake twice.

When it comes to relationships and commitments, some people might never grow up enough to accept the full responsibility of staying committed.

But hopefully we're mature enough to know that while there is a little bit of truth in every joke, our commitments to each other and to ourselves should never be taken lightly.

HAZELNUT CHICKEN BITES

A cocktail-party favourite.

2 poached skinless, boneless chicken breasts
1/4 cup (125 mL) Dijon mustard
1/4 cup (125 mL) mayonnaise
3/4 cup (175 mL) toasted and finely chopped hazelnuts

Cut chicken into 3/4" cubes. Mix mustard and mayonnaise together in separate bowl. Roll chicken in mayonnaise & mustard mixture. Then roll chicken in the chopped hazelnuts.

Spear each cube with a toothpick. Chill, covered, until ready to serve, for up to a day. Set on a serving plate and garnish with cherry tomatoes if desired. Makes 4 dozen bites.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Amy is our only child, and we have coddled and spoiled her throughout her life. Over Chanukah, Amy announced her engagement to Brian. He is a very special young man and we love him dearly.

Brian's parents are very well off and they have dreamed up this lavish extravaganza of a wedding for the kids. It's not what we want Amy's wedding to be like. We have saved for this day so that Amy could have the wedding she always imagined: a meaningful one with family and friends, not one full of clients and acquaintances.

Brian's parents have insisted on paying for the whole thing, but that isn't acceptable to us either. They are very overpowering people and we would like to put a stop to the circus they have envisioned without causing a rift or hurt feelings.

What is your suggestion?

Wedding, not a Circus

Dear Wedding, not a Circus

Mazal tov on your daughter's engagement. Planning a wedding can be very stressful, but planning one well can be a journey of love and pride. There are many minds involved, and rarely is there a meeting of them all.

The first thing to do is speak to the kids and find out what their wishes are. They are adults and will have their own ideas about their wedding. Everything else is secondary. Your hopes and dreams may not be the same as Amy's, and Brian's may not be the same as his parents.

Everyone needs to take a deep breath and take two steps back. Let the kids present you with what they would like and then both sets of parents should jump in and help in any way they can to make their children's special day come true. Besides being the beginning of a new life for the kids, marriage is also a melding of two families.

Be open-minded. You are Amy's most important confidante and her greatest support. You are there to send her on a new journey in her life.

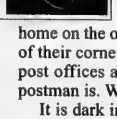
The tsunami: a challenge of faith

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



The earth burped and more than 150,000 people were swept away. The tsunami was a fierce expulsion of energy without conscience or feeling. It was neither a coward nor a gentleman, yet it flailed about maniacally in a store of superior crystal.

The tsunami was an act of God. It yanked at our faith strings and pierced our foolish belief that our connection to the earth is certain. It was the flood that destroyed the world when Noah walked the globe; it was a plague in Egypt; it was the storm that swept Jonah into the ocean and the mouth of a whale.

In 11 countries, men and women walked along the seashore; families slept with their heads nestled against their favourite fibred pillows; hotel staff scurried about preparing for guests – tourists with cash in their pockets. Then, in an uncharacteristic moment, a bellhop turned his head in his last mortal moment only to see a flood of death. Evil waters swarmed him, dragged him, wrapped him in a wet, dripping shroud. They robbed him of his balance and breath; the tsunami entered his mouth so he could no longer speak of his dreams.

We look around, and where a hut once stood, snakes now slither, uprooted from their home on the ocean floor. Villages are bereft of their corner stores; washed away are the post offices and nobody knows where the postman is. Who will deliver the mail?

It is dark in the night because the wires have been dragged into a nearby fjord, and it is silent during the day because the villager's machines are floating about in the guilty sea.

We are baffled by the tsunami because it executed basket makers and their husbands, daughters and sons without charges or judgment. What do you say to that? Who can we shout at? Who can we possibly speak to about this horrifying chaos?

Even the most God-fearing among us must wonder about His reason for splashing away children, farm animals and couples in love. You must! God is good. God is great. God loves his creation. So what of the slow eruptive, disruptive wave that crept into the fishmongers hut – he who had always shared his catch with the other villagers – and lapped his family up like an ice cube in boiling water?

The world has witnessed an act of nature that occurred in a minute – a moment that could have been as mundane as the one before it but instead exploded into a frightening mess, drenching and staining us with the entrails of angst, horror and nausea.

Even if you shut your eyes and try to wipe away the images, you can't. They are everlasting – high resolution. Like the smell of the dead, they never leave your memory. How can they?

A little boy was found dangling in a tree for eight hours. I will never forget that picture, because it is unfair. It is cruel. A boy shouldn't hang from a branch for 480 minutes, unconscious and stuck. A boy should hang from a branch laughing until he falls and roles into soft leaves with his buddies.

Perhaps, as witnesses, our Pesach might be more real this year, because we have seen a plague. Noah will appear more courageous because he survived a tsunami of sorts. Who shall live? Who shall die? Indeed.

Those 150,000 people, mostly poor folk, dreamt about gardens and love. "Elokim b'rav chasdechah, anaynee b'emet yishechah" – "Oh God. Your love is great; answer me with your true deliverance."

And then they were gone.

PERSONALIZED MEDICINE
Treatment as unique as you are.

WE DON'T JUST KNOW OUR PATIENTS BY NAME,

WE KNOW THEM DOWN TO THEIR 3 BILLIONTH STRAND OF DNA.

Why would we want to know our patients right down to their last strand of DNA? Because in our DNA lies important genetic information that determines everything from how tall we'll be to which diseases we're most likely to encounter during our lives. Mount Sinai is a world leader in the study of DNA, which has given birth to a new form of treatment known as personalized medicine. It has allowed us to translate targeted research into customized treatment for the prevention, detection, and curing of diseases. So, perhaps one day, instead of fighting diseases, we'll be able to simply turn them off. Many people believe personalized medicine is as important a step in human history as the invention of fire, the wheel, electricity and computers. And thanks to your generous donations in the past, Mount Sinai has already made incredible breakthroughs in the treatment of cancer and even the world's first permanent remission of rheumatoid arthritis. It's our mission to deliver our patients The Best Medicine. And with your continued support, we'll be able to look at what's unique inside of all of us, and create treatments just as unique for each of our patients.

Bennett leads health team to Israel

—— Officials study state's emergency response preparedness ——

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Carolyn Bennett, Liberal MP for St. Paul's and Canada's minister of state for public health, describes her latest trip to Israel – her sixth – as "inspirational," but not in the spiritual sense.

Bennett and six other public health officials returned this month from a four-day trip to the Jewish state with a far greater understanding and appreciation of what front-line emergency preparedness really is.

A statement from Bennett's office said Israel was chosen for the mission because "it has established probably the world's most robust and efficient disaster response system" – honed through years of bombings, terrorist attacks and threats of bio-logical and chemical assaults.

The minister, a physician and longtime booster of Israel, doesn't quibble with that assessment.

"[Israel is] way beyond probably anyone else in the world when it comes to being prepared for any disaster," Bennett told The CJN on her return.

When Isaac Oziel left Thornhill, Ont., for Israel late last year, he brought along a treasured black and white photo of his father with David Ben-Gurion in 1954. Oziel's father was a renowned cantor in Morocco and his dream was to accept the prime minister's personal invitation to make aliyah. But his wife, a mother of 12, refused, and within months of visiting the young Jewish state, the elder Oziel died, and with him, his visions of a life for his decendants in the Jewish state. Until now.

"If I am not living out my dream, I am living out my father's," Oziel said mid-flight over the Pacific, displaying the photo of his father. "I just felt that the place, even with all the problems, is where I belong. You know, it's made for you.

Michaud Loses Case

QUEBEC CITY — Quebec's National Assembly was within its rights to censure sovereigntist Yves Michaud for saying Jews feel they're the only group in human history to have suffered, a Quebec Superior Court judge ruled last week. Michaud made the comments in 2000 before a legislative committee, and was seeking an apology from the legislature. Former premier Lucien Bouchard rejected Michaud as a Parti Québécois candidate because of the remarks.

CFJS Recognized

TORONTO — The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students was recognized by the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) as the official representative of Canadian Jewish students at WUJS' annual convention last month in Haifa. It gives the CFJS "links with other student organizations in countries as far away as France and Australia," CFJS president Gary Diamond said.

World

UN to Mark 60 Years

NEW YORK — The United Nations will mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz with a special session on Jan. 24. As of last week, 110 member states were backing UN Secretary General Kofi Annan's appeal to hold the special General Assembly session. A majority of the UN's 191 members was needed. The United States, with the help of the EU, led efforts to enlist support. Canada, India, Russia and Australia also backed the session.

Airlift Diplomacy

JAKARTA — An El Al jet delivered tsunami aid last week to Indonesia, a rare open contact between Israel and the world's largest Muslim state. The airlift landed Tuesday in Indonesia after behind-the-scenes co-ordination between Jerusalem and Jakarta. Indonesia does not recognize Israel, but Israeli officials were hopeful ties could be normalized after the donation of clothes and food. The last open contact between the two was in 1994, when then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin visited Indonesia on his way to Japan.

New Security Czar

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush has nominated a Jewish judge to head the Department of Homeland Security. Michael Chertoff, the son of a Conservative rabbi, ran the Justice Department's criminal division from 2001 to 2003 and helped draft the U.S. Patriot Act. He was also U.S. Attorney in New Jersey from 1990 to 1994, and he and his wife were active in the Jewish community. If confirmed by the Senate, he would be the second cabinet-level Jewish appointee. Josh Bolten heads the Office of Management and Budget.

Account List Enlarged

ZURICH — Some 3,100 Holocaust survivors and their heirs will have another chance to apply for compensation for Holocaust-era bank accounts after Swiss banks agreed last week to publish more names of account holders who were likely Shoah victims. The move is part of a $1.25 billion (US) Swiss banks settlement and is in addition to 21,000 names published in 2001. Canadian Jewish Congress has a link to the list and application forms on it website at www.cjc.ca. You can also visit www.crt-ii.org or www.swissbank claims.com directly, or call the Claims Resolution Tribunal Office toll free at 1-800-697-6064.

British Prince Apologizes for Nazi Costume

LONDON — Prince Harry apologized last week for dressing up as a Nazi at a costume party.

"I am very sorry if I caused any offence," Harry, 20, said in a statement after the British tabloid the Sun ran a front-page picture of him in a German army shirt and swastika armband at a weekend bash at a friend's house. "It was a poor choice of costume and I apologize."

Harry, third in line to the throne, has a reputation for being risque, but the costume gaffe was deemed especially insensitive as it came just before the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp and as Queen Elizabeth II was set to host a reception for Shoah survivors on Jan. 27, before representing the nation at the annual Holocaust Memorial Day National Event.

Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, urged the prince to go to Auschwitz on Jan. 27 with the British delegation to learn about Nazi crimes, while Tory leader Michael Howard, who is Jewish, said: "It would be appropriate if we heard from him in person about how contrite he is."

Harry's father, Prince Charles, wants Harry and older brother Prince William to visit Auschwitz, the Sun reported. Charles is reportedly furious with both sons, because William was with Harry when he bought the costume.

Premier helps launch brain clinics at Baycrest

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's Brain Health Centre Clinics (BHCC), were officially opened last week by Premier Dalton McGuinty.

The three clinics within the BHCC, located on the Jack and Anne Weinbaum floor of the Abe and Elsie Posluns building, are the mood and related disorders clinic, the memory clinic, and the stroke and cognition clinic.

They function as a new model for outpatient care that has a multidisciplinary team working side by side with educators and researchers.

The clinics provide care and support to clients and their families, and at the same time, possibly identify new treatments, interventions and preventions.

Stephen Herbert, president and CEO of Baycrest, said the BHCC is uniquely structured so that neuroscientists work alongside clinicians to monitor the progress of treatment and how the brain is responding or changing.

"This collaboration will lead to new ways of treating and managing different cognitive disorders, and contribute to the world pool of knowledge so that many can benefit," Herbert said.

This is essential, he said, because 25 to 30 per cent of patients will require the services of more than one clinic.

By working together, said Dr. Tiffany Chow, a neurologist in the memory clinic, professionals "form an envelope of care around each patient, and that individualizes the management of their disorder.

"Families are provided with educational resources and community supports to help them deal with their caregiving challenges."

Mild cognitive impairment, a condition marked by subtle abnormal memory changes may signal the early onset of a full-blown disease such as Alzheimer's, said Dr. Guy Proulx, a psychologist at the memory clinic.

"The best intervention is early intervention. Ideally we want to see people much earlier in the complaints of memory problems

The Uniqueness of the Holocaust

By equating the attempted annihilation of the Jews with other historical tragedies such as the bombing of Hiroshima, the treatment of Native Americans, black slavery in America or the Armenian tragedy, we tend to view everything on the same level. This lecture will explore in what sense the Holocaust is a singular historical event.

Israel's winery route

From the editor's desk

Last month I spent five days in Israel as the guest of the Ministry of Tourism. My itinerary consisted mainly of visiting places and people I had never seen or met before. Even for the most veteran visitor to Israel, there is always so much that is new and fresh and exciting to experience.

In biblical times, the land of Israel was renowned for its wine. Indeed the words and variants for wine, grape, vine and vineyard appear more than 300 times in the Bible.

The land of Israel yielded its fruit to the loving though callused hands that tilled its soil. Among the fruit for which our ancestors paid frequent, grateful homage was the grape. It is a homage most of us can understand, even if only remotely, each time we recite the Kiddush and thank the Creator of the fruits of the vine.

The wine industry returned to Israel in 1848 when a modest winery was established in the Old City of Jerusalem by a certain Rabbi Shore. There are few records of the rabbi's wine, however. Some 40 years later, in 1882, the wine industry returned in earnest to the land of Israel with the establishment of wineries in Zichron Yaakov and Rishon LeZion by Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

Eli Ben-Zaken

Today, there are more than 120 wineries in Israel. The country is divided into five regions for growing grapes and making wines; from the Golan Heights in the north to deep in Arava Desert of the Negev.

Israel's wines compete with the finest wines around the world. There is no longer any contradiction between the terms kosher and fine wine. The number of gold medals and numerous other distinctions won by Israeli vintners attest to this.

It was my delicious good fortune to visit two of Israel's elite boutique, commercial wineries in the lush, verdant hills west of Jerusalem.

Domaine du Castel is a family-owned winery on Ramat Raziel, some 14 kilometres west of Jerusalem, nestled deeply in the terraced hills of Judea. The wincry takes its name from the nearby Castel fortress (built by the crusaders and used as a monastery in latter times) that dominates the routes from the west through the hills to Jerusalem.

The winery was founded in 1992 by Eli Ben-Zaken, his son Ariel and his son-in-law Arnon Geva. The family's first grapes, however, were planted on the hillside in 1988.

Ben-Zaken is a man of culture and sophistication, whose life experiences have taken him from Morocco, through Egypt, Italy, Switzerland and, ultimately, Israel. The soft-spoken vintner recounted with great pride his family's achievements and his relationship with the surrounding hills and fields in which he has planted his vines and from which he has cultivated his award-winning wines.

Ronny James

His wine cellar, some 80 metres long, is where the wine-filled oak barrels rest until it is their turn to be opened and bottled. From planting to bottling takes some two and a half years.

Ben-Zaken's winery produces three wines of which two are red and one is white. Castel Grand Vin, is a blend of grapes, including cabernet sauvignon, merlot and petit verdot, and Petit Castel is a blend of merlot with some cabernet. The winery produces the white wine 'C' Blanc du Castel, a Chardonnay.

He spoke of his wines with the tenderness of a father speaking of his children. "The aroma and the taste of the wine is found in the skin of the red grape. But this is the opposite for white wine," he told me.

The area is one of "deep culture and history," Ben-Zaken said. "With our winery and others, too, we can show this to the tourists and to the world."

Ten minutes by car to the north and the east are the Tzora vineyards and elite boutique winery owned by the kibbutz of the same name, Tzora, which derives from the biblical birthplace of Samson.

Tzora's vintner, Ronny James, also arrived in Israel through a path that started in Egypt. He is a self-taught, award-winning, outgoing, gregarious viticulturist who has trained an entire younger generation of vintners and viticulturists. In 2004, the winery produced some 60,000 bottles of merlot, cabernet and zinfandel.

The kibbutz has a small shop on the premises where its wines, foodstuffs and other small consumer products of the region are offered for sale to visiting tourists.

Israeli winemakers are now establishing their reputations throughout the world as producers of excellent wines. In truth, the wines are a reflection of the personalities of the individuals who, working the land, its geography, climate and even its history, bring forth new wines from the vines as in the days of old. Having met Eli Ben-Zaken and Ronny James, it is not hard to see why.

Next week, more stops on the veteran's itinerary. — MBD

WJC MEETING SPROUTS IN BRUSSELS:

Edgar Bronfman, seated left, was re-elected president of the World Jewish Congress last week at the WJC's plenary session in Brussels. Some 500 delegates from Jewish communities around the world also confirmed Israel Singer as chairman of the WJC's board of governors. The group's former senior vice-president, Isi Leibler, who was dismissed from the WJC's steering committee in September, did not run for re-election. Also at the meeting, Robert Abrams, a former New York State attorney general who now serves as special counsel to the WJC, said he had been in contact with the office of the current attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, to indicate the group would co-operate with an informal inquiry Spitzer launched into allegations of financial impropriety. With Bronfman, are, seated from left, Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt and Israel's Ambassador to Belgium and Luxembourg Jehudi Kinar (a past Israeli consul-general for Toronto and Western Canada). Standing from left are Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Moshe Ronen, chair of the governing board of CJC and a newly elected WJC vice-president; and Hershell Sabbat, vice-chair of CJC's Ontario region.

COR unaffected by U.S. kosher slaughter case

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Kosher slaughtering practices in Toronto differ from those at the AgriProcessors plant in Iowa, which was recently targeted by People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada.

When killing animals, slaughterhouses here adhere both to halachic requirements and to those enforced by the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, he said.

Late last year, a PETA representative posing as an employee shot a secret video at AgriProcessors, makers of Aaron's and other brands. It recorded how animals suffered during the slaughtering process used.

The group filed lawsuits with the U.S. Department of Agriculture against the plant and the Orthodox Union (OU), the largest kosher supervisory organization in the world.

It alleged that since the animals were not killed instantly, the plant violated both Jewish law and U.S. government slaughter laws.

In a press release, Rabbi Menachem Genack, rabbinic administrator of OU's kosher division, said that during the seven-week period when the video was shot, 18,000 cattle were slaughtered.

"There was a tiny percentage of animals whose carotid arteries were not completely severed so they were not completely unconscious," Rabbi Genack said.

The process that PETA objected to has now been discontinued, he added.

A PETA spokesperson said complaints against the OU will be rescinded if the group follows a series a recommendations made by Temple Grandin, an associate professor of animal science at Colorado State University who designs cattle-moving machinery parts.

Rabbi Levin said Grandin has inspected plants here and was satisfied that the animals have been handled properly, "and was comfortable with our procedures."

Manuel Tavares, president of Dominion Packers in Toronto, has been slaughtering animals according to halachic procedure and Canadian Food Inspection Agency requirements for "many years and no one has ever complained. If their throat is cut quickly, they suffer little stress. We're still killing animals, however. How humane can it be?"

According to a representative from the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, in ritual slaughter, "properly restrained animals may be slaughtered without stunning, provided the slaughter is carried out by experienced persons.

"Such slaughter shall be performed by a single cut which shall result in rapid, simultaneous and a complete severance of the jugular veins and carotid arteries so as to cause rapid unconsciousness of the animal.

"Operators not providing and using adequate means of restraint are prohibited from carrying out ritual slaughter," he said.

Student sells website to aid tsunami victims

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though he was dubbed a "wave rat" by a major New York newspaper and accused of trying to cash in on tsunami relief efforts, Toronto student Josh Kaplan says he has not been deterred from charitable endeavours.

Instead, he hopes the $10,000 U.S. he raised for a Thailand charity will inspire other people "to do good."

Kaplan, a 20-year-old student at the Ontario College of Art & Design (OCAD), said "the most important thing for me was to raise $10,000 and it went directly, within one day, to a relief organization in Thailand."

Only days before the money was sent to Chabad of Thailand, however, the New York Post ran a story suggesting Kaplan was trying to personally benefit from the sale of a domain name, tsunamirelief.com.

Kaplan said he was disappointed by the story: "I was trying to do something good, but it made me seem like the bad guy." He said he always intended to use the proceeds from the sale of the name to help those devastated by the tidal wave that swept across coastal regions of Asia and Africa on Dec. 26.

His first attempt at providing aid came when he found the site and offered to donate his web design and graphics skills to enhance it. The site's owner agreed to transfer the name to Kaplan for $99.99. Kaplan agreed and had it up and running as a web portal, with links to various relief organizations. The site registered an average of 500 hits a day.

Meanwhile, Kaplan was discussing with his parents and friends other ways to leverage the site to increase its value for relief efforts. He liked the idea of auctioning it on EBay, with the expected $50,000 U.S. proceeds to go to the Red Cross.

The auction caught the attention of the New York Post and after speaking to a reporter from the tabloid newspaper, Kaplan was surprised that his story suggested he was attempting to profit from the sale of the domain name.

After consulting with his rabbi, Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad@Flamingo, he decided to accept one of the purchase offers he had received. He sold the name to GoldenPalace.com, an online casino company based in Montreal, on condition the $10,000 proceeds be transferred directly to Chabad of Thailand.

Rabbi Kaplan (no relation to Josh) said Chabad Lubavitch maintains three permanent offices in Thailand and has been assisting Israelis and Jews in that country affected by the tsunami. "Lubavitch is the only Jewish organization that has an infrastructure on the ground in the ring of fire."

According to Chabad of Thailand's website (www.jewishthailand.com), Chabad is staffed by six rabbis and a dozen rabbinical students, servicing a community of several hundred permanent residents and thousands of Jewish visitors. In the aftermath of the tsunami, Chabad representatives identified bodies, arranged medical help, facilitated telephone calls, provided shelter and clothing and counselled those who lost loved ones.

Josh Kaplan

"I think Josh... is a good Jewish boy who wanted to do something good, and he is doing something good," Rabbi Kaplan said. "It shows that one boy with a computer and software was able to raise a lot of money and help a lot of people."

Josh said the online gaming company has agreed to employ the website as a portal to link to international charities participating in tsunami relief, and not use it for gaming purposes.

He said his instructors at OCAD had influenced his decision to get involved in tsunami relief, teaching that "we as designers play an important role in changing the world and improving life. I figured this was my responsibility. I don't know many 20-year-olds that could donate $10,000.

"In the future in my design career, I will base a lot of work on charitable work and improving the world. I can't let this get in my way. I'll just take it as an experience."

Toy drive organized to help child survivors of disaster

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Like many of us, singer and actress Ofir Ronit Engel was appalled by the devastation caused by last month's earthquake and tsunami, and she desperately wanted to help.

She particularly wanted to do something for the children in hospitals and shelters who, she fears, may simply have given up hope because of what has happened to them.

"After the disaster, a lot of people were left with nothing, especially the children. They got food and medicine, just the essentials, but nothing to play with and nothing to do."

She decided to collect donations of stuffed animals from local children – "Everyone likes stuffed animals – they are so comforting," she said – accompanied with a personal note or drawing from the children who donated them.

"So that life won't look so horrible," she said.

Engel has also solicited donations from toy stores and companies, who she said have been very generous, and she has made arrangements to have the toys shipped to Sri Lanka at the end of January.

Toys can be dropped off at Cafe Neo, 782 St. Clair Ave. W. With a donation of four or more stuffed animals, Cafe Neo will give donors a free coffee or pop.

Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, – which will accept donations "as long as they keep coming in," a spokesperson said – is also planning to send toys. Chabad of Thailand, where donations from Chabad organizations are being sent, is actively involved in finding missing persons and offering help at local hospitals.

Federations and national organizations continue to accept donations, especially of money. Requests have come from Southeast Asia to restrict aid to financial aid, since facilities to store or distribute material goods are limited.

Waiting for Abbas

Two days before Mahmoud Abbas was to be sworn in as the new leader of the Palestinian Authority, Palestinian terrorists launched an attack against the Karni crossing point in the Gaza Strip – the main commercial crossing for Palestinians in Gaza. The terrorists killed six Israelis.

The nature, timing and participants in the attack were quite revealing. The attack was not a spur-of-the-moment assault by a disparate group of gangsters. Rather, the use of effective and expensive ordinance including hidden explosives, a large truck, significant fire power and bullet-proof vests, suggests a sophisticated military operation that involved considerable tactical planning and co-ordination. Since the attack involved members of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades ostensibly controlled by Abbas' Fatah movement and it took place on the eve of his assuming the reins of power, it was clearly meant to send the newly elected leader a powerful message: the rejectionists will not be subordinate to Abbas' authority unless he subordinates his aims to theirs. And just to keep up the pressure on him, they resorted once again to launching Qassam rockets on the people of Sderot and nearby kibbutzim, even after his swearing-in last Saturday. Indeed, in a space of six days since Abbas' election, 30 missiles and mortar shells have fallen on the Jews of the Gaza Strip.

Not surprisingly, the government of Israel reacted by suspending, for the time being, the planned meeting between Abbas and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

According to a report in Ha'aretz, senior Israeli sources said the decision to boycott the talks was made because they had learned that local Palestinian security figures in Gaza had sought permission to move against the terror infrastructure "but had not gotten a green light from the PA leadership." In addition, initial investigations of the Karni attack point to the complicity of Palestinian police officers.

To be sure, some PA officials decried Israel's decision to suspend governmental contacts. "Any action Abu Mazen [Mahmoud Abbas] takes against extremists behind the escalation in the Gaza Strip will lead to his being blamed for caving in to Israeli pressure," a senior Palestinian said. But this complaint is disingenuous, for it is nothing more than an excuse to block any measures against the murderers. Abbas has promised the West he will implement the "road map" peace plan. But without "dismantling" the terrorists, the first obligation of the road map – not reaching merely a truce with them or securing a ceasefire with them – he shows he is really not intent on doing so. In the meantime, Sharon has instructed the Israeli army to strike at the terrorists "on an unrestricted basis so long as the Palestinians refrain from lifting a finger."

"We do not expect them [the Palestinians] to complete their work against terror," a senior source said, "but they should at least start."

It was reported early this week that Abbas had given orders to prevent further attacks on Israelis. The entire West, indeed everyone interested in a bona fide peace between Israelis and Palestinians, not just Israelis, is waiting to see if this means Abbas has started.

Same-sex marriage

This is in response to Rabbi Howard Morrison vis-à-vis the official policy of the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, regarding legal homosexual marriage (Letter, CJN, Jan. 6).

My dear brother, Hartley, abided by all the Jewish dogma and indoctrinations that would deem him "acceptable" within Jewish culture and society. He was a true neshamah who practised the canons of Judaism and adhered to its principles and beliefs.

Hartley therefore hid his homosexuality, choosing instead to abide by that which the honourable rabbis deem "sacred." His double life of secrecy, shame, insecurity and diminished self-worth precipitated a confluence of personal tragedies culminating in his suicide this past summer.

The tragic life and death of my brother is by no means an isolated incident. Not willing to risk an irreverence to God, the Jewish faith and their families, and in fear of becoming disenfranchised by our community, homosexual Jewish men and women who live among us often feign heterosexuality, marry and have families while living in shame and denial.

The issue the Rabbinical Assembly should reconsider before the sanctity of marriage and family ought to be the Judaic responsibilities of respect, tolerance, love and acceptance for each single, sacred life. By discriminating and denying even one life, the foundation of our society, that sacred family of which the rabbis speak, is, in effect, desecrated.

Can we ensure Jewish continuity?

I have read the report Between Thriving and Decline, The Jewish People 2004 ("Challenge to Jewish leaders," CJN, Dec. 16 and 23) and found it disturbing.

It indicates that from 1970 to 2003, the world population grew by more than 70 per cent, but the total Jewish population grew by only two per cent. Jewish population growth, at 13 million, approached zero in 2004.

The last 20 years have brought a significant increase in enrolment at Jewish day schools. Despite this, the recent intermarriage rate in Canada is 35 per cent.

So what is the solution to our population problem, if Jewish education is not the answer to ensuring Jewish continuity? The report concludes: "... a thriving future can be assured if – and this is a big 'if' – resources are used optimally for well-considered future-weaving efforts. But the findings also indicate that in the absence of such efforts, the future of the Jewish people is in doubt."

According to the report, counteracting demographic decline depends on policies aimed at sustaining the Jewish family through the use of technology, including cyberspace. For more than two years, my committee has been trying to initiate a community outreach concept that meets these criteria. Despite endorsement by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto, the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, our "future-weaving" proposal cannot get off the ground for lack of adequate funding.

According to the report, prominent Jewish donors direct only one-third of their charitable contributions to Jewish causes and two-thirds to museums, universities, hospitals and medical institutions. Maybe it is time they re-think their priorities before it is too late.

Raoul Wallenberg commemorative day

On Jan. 17, Canadians mark a national day devoted to Raoul Wallenberg. Wallenberg, a Swedish citizen, risked his life to save 100,000 Jews from the Nazis. He was arrested by the former Soviet government on Jan. 17, 60 years ago, and was never seen again.

Wallenberg's imprisonment has become an important issue in the struggle for human rights throughout the world. At this time again, principles of humanity – the basis of democracy – are under attack. Do we have the right to be passive or silent and remain standing on the sidelines? Wallenberg's courage helps us to answer the question.

His legacy of steadfast determination to save innocent lives and to restore dignity to all human beings continues to inspire us. Please visit the website rwallenberg-int.org for more information about Wallenberg.

Soldier's grave found in France

The grave of a Jewish Canadian soldier, Israel Joseph Friedman, has been discovered in the French village of Romeries in a Commonwealth war graves cemetery. Friedman, of the Canadian Railway Troops, fell on Oct. 28, 1918, at age 29.

Terence Etherton of London wonders if any of Friedman's family members would be interested in having the photographs he took of the gravestone.

According to Veterans Affairs Canada, Friedman was born in Disna, Russia, in 1888, the son of Joseph and Sarah Friedman. His parents lived in Brooklyn, N.Y., but Friedman's address at the time he enlisted was in Medicine Hat, Alta. He was a school teacher and took an officers' training course in Calgary in 1914. He was single.

Life at a checkpoint: a soldier's story

By AVI YUFEST

(The author is a Torontonian serving in the Israel Defence Forces. In Hebrew, he is called a chayal boded, a soldier from abroad without family in Israel. His observations were written in November 2004. He completed his tour of duty last week.)

We spent two weeks in Hebron, which was a real eye-opener regarding Israeli-Palestinian relations (or lack thereof) and the tactics used in fighting terrorism. I won't go into detail about what we actually did there, because I fear I would be unable to draw you a full picture of the situation in the city.

I can tell you that my company, which is roughly 70 per cent the size of a normal company that would man the outpost we were stationed in, worked around the clock, without complaining, until we were relieved by a larger unit. I was very impressed with the dedication I saw in Hebron.

That dedication continues in our new assignment, very close to Jerusalem actually, where we are manning a checkpoint, as well as doing patrols, surveillance and observation. My platoon is handling the checkpoint, which in my opinion is the best of the three tasks.

The Checkpoint

I like the checkpoint. It's very hands-on. It gives you the feeling that you are doing something that directly affects security, and because of its proximity to Jerusalem, it's one of the last lines of defence against terrorists. The checkpoint has three shifts a day, 24 hours a day. The night shift, which seems to have become my slot, is relatively quiet, but it covers the crucial hours of the early morning, when terrorist bombers traditionally try to sneak into Israel. My fellow soldiers at the checkpoint think that my background in criminology makes me some sort of criminal profiler. I guess since I am usually the oldest soldier at the checkpoint, and because I have read some material on the subject, I am slightly better off than most others.

I try to use logic when I check cars. I ask drivers (and sometimes passengers) where they've been, what they were doing there, where they're going and for what reason, where they live, what type of work they do (if it's not a cab of course) – not because I care what they do, but I watch a driver's face to see if he shows any fear. I also check each passenger for that nervous look. Half the time, the Palestinians speak awful Hebrew or their accents are too thick for me to fully understand them, but the idea is that they should know we're checking and not just waving them by.

If a car appears to be riding low, often it's because of blown shocks that most Palestinians are too poor to fix. But sometimes it's a sign the car has a lot of weight in it, which can mean that explosives or weapons are on board, as they tend to be heavy. In cases like that, I'll check the trunk, pull up the carpet in the trunk and check the spare tire well – a notorious place to hide weapons. Sometimes, I'll get down on my knees and check underneath the car – another good hiding spot.

Statistically, the typical profile of a suicide bomber is a male between the ages of 18 and 35. People who fall into this bracket often have their identification cards checked (although not exclusively, I should add). We've actually caught a number of fake I.D. cards doing just that.

Anybody who seems to be overdressed during the day – in winter, it's still warm in Israel during the daytime – may have something hidden underneath his clothes. Those guys are also checked.

So it's pretty clear that I don't use any special tactics. I just try to use my common sense when dealing with people.

Women at the checkpoint complicate matters. The Israeli army goes out of its way to ensure that Islamic beliefs are honoured, even if it means compromising security. Traditional Muslim garb for women is very loose and formless, leaving plenty of room to hide objects underneath. But we're not allowed to touch or check women. Only female border police check them, and, typically, only when they're entering Israeli territory.

Perhaps the biggest danger of the checkpoint is people who walk up to it while moving from one town to another by foot. The only way to check them is to approach them with a metal detector and scan them personally. But by the time you are within a few feet of a guy, he could detonate a bomb, taking you with him.

The platoon commander I've spent most of my checkpoint time with doesn't let us check walk-ups. He doesn't want to put us at risk. Instead, he does the checking himself. The guy has balls of steel. All too often, newspapers report about bombers who blow themselves up at checkpoints, taking soldiers with him, but that doesn't seem to faze my commander – or at least he doesn't show it on the outside.

The residents of the nearby Jewish city often bring us things to eat and drink. Sandwiches, doughnuts, laffa bread, tea and coffee are just a few of the things they give us. Like I said earlier, I rather like the checkpoint.

Reconnaissance and the Checkpoint

The night shift isn't a bad shift if you don't want to deal with a lot of cars, but soldiers have been known to fall asleep while standing up. One night, we entered the briefing room, and within a few moments we knew it was not going to be an ordinary shift. We were told that the checkpoint will be left empty for a few hours while we scanned the area for signs that somebody had been watching us. Then we were to continue on foot to a nearby Arab village where we were to check for suspicious activity and complete a number of other assignments asked of us by intelligence. I was given night-vision binoculars, which emphasized the seriousness of the reconnaissance mission. I'd almost never handled these things before, because prior missions have never warranted using (and risking) such expensive equipment.

Avi Yufest on the radio

A Hummer dropped us off at the checkpoint and we began sweeping eastward to the Arab village, all the while checking for anything unusual. We reached a barbed wire fence and walked along it, spreading out to make sure we couldn't be killed all at once if we were attacked, as not even a mortar bomb has the range to cover the distance between us. After a few moments, we found the fence had been cut. Somebody had clearly used this path before. We got down on our knees for safety, and I began scanning the area with the night-vision binoculars while another soldier did the same with the night-vision scope on his gun.

Everything looked clear and we continued to sweep. We crossed through the fence and on the other side was a cluster of trees, not big enough to be a forest or even a mini-forest, but big enough to turn this sweep into some guerrilla warfare-style fight, should it come to that.

Going through trees is incredibly dangerous, almost stupid even, because flashlights are useless and night-vision equipment has limited range. Nonetheless, we swept the area and continued toward the town. The treed area opened into a relatively barren field, so again we all knelt down and scanned the area with our optics. Although there was only a half moon in the sky, it lit up the field, making us visible to others in close proximity. I caught my silhouette on the ground – with a big ceramic bulletproof vest, a utility vest on top of that and my gun always pointed up, it was very intimidating and war-movie-like.

We resumed our sweep and reached what appeared to be an abandoned house not far from the village. The dogs in the village began to howl incessantly. I think they heard us, because when we stopped moving for a few moments, they quieted down. We must have been a good half a kilometre away and walking like we were on eggshells, but they seemed to know we were there. They must have been trained well. After clearing the house, we proceeded to the backyard, where we saw that the house was far from abandoned. It may be have looked trashed on the inside, but there were rows of romaine lettuce growing out back. We set up there, as the house sat on an ascending path and provided a good view of the village.

Noiselessly, we sat and watched the town, checking the things we were there to check, gathering the information we were there to gather. After about two hours, we packed up, and swept another area on our way back to the checkpoint and continued our operations as normal.

The Checkpoint Ambush

For a few nights, we left the checkpoint empty to give terrorists the impression that we had stopped manning it at night. But the IDF is not that negligent.

After a few nights, one briefing began with my squad commander declaring: "Tonight, we are going to catch a terrorist." Everyone's ears perked up. That briefing was unlike the nearly identical ones we receive daily. It was geared to a special task and that task alone. We began to wonder if our commander was withholding information. Perhaps intelligence passed along some information about a specific car that we were supposed to intercept. We would never know the answer, but all signs pointed to yes.

The plan was simple. We were to be dropped off down the road from the checkpoint and sweep the immediate area to ensure that no one was in hiding trying to ambush us. When cars passed, we were to hide so that no one knew we were there. We were told that the lights around the checkpoint were shut off by the day shift, so it was in near-total darkness. Once we swept the area, we were to take up positions around the checkpoint and wait.

At the checkpoint, we did the sweep and set up for the ambush. We lay in wait for nearly three hours, but the car we were looking for didn't show. Other cars passed, perhaps scout cars, but our vehicle doesn't show. The sky began to shift from its blackness to a dark, bluish-purple and we knew the ambush was a failure. We returned to the base to debrief.

My commander was disappointed but I wasn't. I thought we performed near flawlessly, and I think if we continue in the same way, eventually we will get them.

Disasters - how and why

When disaster strikes, two questions dominate our thoughts. "How did this happen?" and "Why did this happen?" The "how" question is more easily treated with answers from the scientific all the way to the psychological.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

The "why" question remains more challenging. Many have tried to answer it with all sorts of theological or philosophical answers. Few are satisfying or even cogent.

The 2004 earthquake/tsunami combined to destroy individuals, families and communities, causing 2005 to begin with an awareness of our human vulnerability and global responsibility. The disaster in Asia reached into our living rooms and shook the walls of our homes. The ensuing response of concern and practical help is gratifying, yet it leaves us with those very questions about "how" and "why." "How" suggests science, with plate movements and sea shifts; "why" leaves us frightened.

As Jews, we have experienced many tragedies, and our tradition is rich in attempts at explanation. The wisdom of our ancestors reverberates but does not entirely satisfy. In synagogue, my husband Rabbi Howard Joseph spoke of Maimonides' categorization of evil into two types: human and natural. As terrifying as human evil can be, we accept that we must try to defeat it. But natural evil seems way beyond our means and understanding. Yet, the two are not so easily separated.

The "how" question might lead us to a more comprehensive approach to natural disasters. Embedded in the scientific explanations, we can find an arena of human accounts. After all, natural disasters can be predicted. Warnings can be issued. The "how" leads to "why." Why wasn't there an early warning system? Why weren't buildings in Southeast Asia built like those in San Francisco, which survived a 9.5-scale quake with only 83 dead? All these uncertainties raise the issue to one of human governance. "How could it happen?" leads to "We could have done more before the tragedy."

So natural evil has a human component. Human evil is exhibited not just in the unimaginable stories of child kidnaping, looting and cruelty. It's found in human indifference and ignorance. Faced with the devastation, we help, but what about prevention. What could have been done? What should we do elsewhere?

Above my computer is a poster. It commemorates the Dec. 6, 1989, murder of 14 women in Montreal. The message is potent: "First mourn. Then work for change." Yet here, too, I am struck by our selfishness. The poster lists a number of sponsoring agencies, while the women's names are lost in this organizational clamour. Anonymous victims and boastful benefactors.

After the tsunami, lists of donors appear before us daily, as self-centred governments, organizations and individuals are enumerated. Is this some obscene competition? Just do the job without all the self-promotion.

First mourn. Then work for change.

Messianic settlers put all of Israel at risk

One sabbatical year in Israel, we travelled to Gush Etzion in the West Bank, where descendants of the original Gush members had begun to rebuild the settlement. We took a picture of our daughter under one of the few remaining trees. It seemed a fitting notion – to rebuild what had been destroyed.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Then, a more unsettling encounter. That same year, we were treated to a tour of Hebron's crumbling Jewish quarter and graphic pictures of the 1929 massacres. Our guide was a settler (with pink kova and a gun on his hip) who showed us plans for the settlements of Hebron. We felt uneasy.

In early 1975, we met with Ariel Sharon, and he unveiled his plan for the future: a West Bank free of Arabs, re-populated with Anglo-Saxon Jews from America who would settle the West Bank in huge numbers and re-make the face of the country. Now we were really uneasy.

One more story: I was visiting the Burnt House, a relic in the old city of Jerusalem from the war against the Romans. The "house" is really a room with a few pieces of stone furniture and the remains of a stairwell that would have led up to a main floor. A group of schoolchildren tumbled in next to me. The guide/guard, a bearded man with a gun at his hip, recounted a story to the children. What I heard him deliver was an incandescent call to arms to imitate the zealots who had literally brought the house down around them.

Where am I going with this? Whatever romantic thoughts places such as Gush Etzion or Efrat may raise, settlements have become a terrible burden to Israel and a heavy chain that is dragging the country and its hopes for a settlement with the Palestinians into a black pit. Settlements are a bad, destructive idea, one that Sharon promoted for too long and one that will cost him and the country dearly.

Settlements, and the unrealistic messianic theories behind them, have brewed a noxious cocktail that will poison us in the future.

Item: settler reserve army officers and their rabbinic mentors call for a refusal to obey orders to remove Gaza settlements.

Item: settlers curse and attack Palestinian children on the way to school, and Israel must send soldiers to guard the kids.

Item: other settlers – teens and adults – are involved in attacks on Palestinians and their olive groves in an effort to terrorize the Arabs and drive them away. I don't know how many rabbinic injunctions they are disobeying – don't cut down the fruit trees of an enemy town, for starters – but they justify it all with calls for the God-given right to live in some imaginary biblical land of Israel.

That's their plan, and they're trying to carry it out with rabbinic sanction. And they link it all to some mythical need to make places such as Gaza, a Philistine city, into part of the Promised Land. Moses gave Gaza a wide berth, and King David escaped only by feigning madness.

This is all wrong, wrong, wrong – and we in the Diaspora are complicit whenever we refuse to stand up to egregious statements made by settler leaders. They don't just make us look bad – they make us look terrible, rapacious and imperialistic. But their whole theory is wrong, and reports that settlers resisting evacuation from Gaza will be joined by evangelical Christians is even worse news.

When I began writing this column years ago, I wanted to focus on Jews in Canada – after all, I don't live in Israel. But this issue touches me deeply. I love Israel and her people. I want this long war to be over before it becomes a new Hundred Years War, with the devastation and soul-destruction such a conflict entails. To make holy every inch of the West Bank – grounding our claims in some ineffable promise that consumes our sons and daughters, and the sons and daughters of the Palestinians – is to destroy what Israel has built in honour.

Are we going to sanctify that Burnt House and maybe risk being engulfed by another catastrophe? If so, we, the Jewish people, will have our souls deformed, our hearts wrung out, our essential truths destroyed.

The power of storytelling

With the recent death of Alberta's lieutenant-governor, Lois Hole, the world has lost a warm, caring and compassionate individual. Known affectionately as the "Queen of Hugs," Hole was sensitive to and outspoken about issues related to education, charity and social justice.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In her final holiday message to the people of Alberta, a message she knew would be her last, she wrote: "This holiday season, use your imagination, follow your convictions and offer some warm, caring hugs. And remember to keep telling your stories; they can change the world. Enjoy the holidays. Thank you for listening to my stories and for sharing your own with me."

In our daily lives, we are surrounded by stories. In popular culture, many of our stories are told through motion pictures, television, the fine arts, and even through commercial messages. On television, dramatic, documentary and news presentations are now joined by so-called reality programming that attests to our interest in how other people live their lives. And the Internet offers many forms of storytelling, from instant messages to blogs (web logs or web diaries).

History is a form of storytelling and we read history to learn how the world became the place it is today. The late Pierre Berton, who was professionally a journalist but, above all, was a great storyteller, wrote the stories that taught us to appreciate our Canadian roots and heritage.

Stories have recently assumed juridical legitimacy in that our courts are now, in the context of the interpretation of treaties and/or the settlement of land claims, recognizing and accepting as valid evidence the tradition of oral history passed down through the generations by the elders of our Aboriginal Peoples.

Storytelling is becoming more popular and has recently attracted serious academic consideration. At a gathering of writers at Fredericton's St.Thomas University this past November, participants discussed "the power of stories to empower and transform." And organizations such as TALES Edmonton (a chapter of The Alberta League Encouraging Storytelling) sponsor storytelling events and give public performances for both adults and children at festivals, concerts, libraries and schools across Canada.

Stories even reach out to us from beyond the end of life. Life stories are briefly told through information written in obituaries. And in a recent book, The Final Word: The Book of Canadian Epitaphs, author Nancy Millar shares individual stories gleaned from the inscriptions on headstones from coast to coast.

Our Torah is replete with stories: stories that relate our history, stories that convey a moral message, stories that inspire, inform, uplift.

Through the d'var Torah or sermon, our rabbis and service leaders share the stories, interpret the messages and pass on the wisdom that emerges from the text of the weekly passage.

It has been repeated many times that those who ignore history are doomed to repeat it. That is especially relevant for a people whose history is marked with the dark days of pogroms and the Holocaust. But our history is also replete with triumphs and accomplishment and we should, through our stories, celebrate these significant achievements that mark our legacy.

Our history has been chronicled through Jewish encyclopedias, in Jewish biographies and in many works about our various communities and our collective life experiences. However, we nonetheless have a duty to augment these works on a personal level by recording and passing on our own stories and the stories of our parents and grandparents – midor l'dor – from generation to generation.

These stories will both enrich our children's lives and give them an understanding of who they are and what their place is in this world.

That, essentially, is the essence of Lieut.-Gov. Lois Hole's last public message. So, what ever way you choose to do it – pick up a pen or put a fresh tape in your tape recorder, send an e-mail or simply phone a family member – tell your stories, record your stories, pass on your stories and the stories of your parents and grandparents. It will be a priceless gift you can give to your family.

The Kirshner File

India expands its relations with Israel

David Danieli, Israel's ambassador to India, was in an upbeat mood as he talked about India's startling rapprochement with Israel. "Our relations are moving from strength to strength in all fields," he said in an interview, just days after Israel's deputy prime minister and minister of trade and industry, Ehud Olmert, accompanied by a delegation of 50 Israeli entrepreneurs, wrapped up a three-day visit to India last month.

Sheldon Kirshner in New Delhi

In every respect, Israel's relations with India – which rest on a solid foundation of trade, tourism, scientific and academic exchanges and co-operation in counter-terrorism – have grown exponentially since the establishment of formal diplomatic ties on Jan. 29, 1992, following a long period of coolness. And if conventional wisdom means anything, the death of Yasser Arafat – the Palestinian leader whose image in India was always rather glowing – could well reinforce Israel's burgeoning ties with India.

Yaron Mayer, the counsellor for political affairs at Israel's walled, fortress-like embassy in New Delhi, which faces the residence of Canada's ambassador, said that India and Israel are bound by mutual interests, the first of which turns on trade. Mouneer Agbariya, Israel's first secretary of economic affairs, pointed out that bilateral trade, which was only $200 million U.S. 13 years ago, rose to $2 billion last year, excluding lucrative defence contracts. It could reach the $5-billion mark by 2007, according to Shri Kamal Nath, India's minister of commerce and industry.

Israel's key exports include polished diamonds, chemicals, medical, optical, agricultural and telecommunications equipment and pharmaceuticals. India's main exports run the gamut from uncut diamonds, textiles and food to agricultural products, organic chemicals and dyes.

By all accounts, Olmert chalked up significant gains as he and and his fellow travellers promoted Israel at three prime destinations: New Delhi, the capital; Mumbai, the commercial hub, and Bangalore, the centre of the software industry. During their visit, India and Israel agreed to set up a special commission to study the feasibility of creating a comprehensive economic partnership, particularly in research and development, biotechnology, telecommunications and electronics. Prior to its arrival in India, Reliance Industries, India's largest holding company, expressed interest in investing in Israel.

As a result of such pace-setting developments, India has overtaken China and is now Israel's second-largest trading partner in Asia after Japan, noted Danieli, a former ambassador to Singapore who was posted here a year and a half ago. "India has one of the fastest growing, most robust economies in the world," he added.

India, in particular, has become one of Israel's best customers in the hotly contested arms trade. Toward the close of last year, Israel Military Industries won a $130-million contract to build five plants in the Indian state of Bihar to produce explosive materials. Recently, Israel Military Industries and Indian contractors signed a deal to jointly manufacture 125-millimetre tank shells.

In 2003, Israel sold the Phalcon early warning radar system to India, a nuclear power since 1998. The United States, in marked contrast to its fierce opposition to the supply of Israeli Phalcons to China, did not raise any objections to the $1.1-billion sale. Similarly, Washington did not object to a transaction under which Israel will provide India with Green Pine radar, a component of the Arrow missile system, jointly developed by Israel and the United States.

Three years ago, the Indian defence minister, George Fernandes, announced that India and Israel were planning to co-produce and market an advanced light helicopter. In 1996, India purchased an air combat manoeuvring instrumentation system and two Dvora MK-2 patrol boats from Israel.

Israeli companies have helped India upgrade some of its aging Soviet MIG-27 fighter jets and T-72 tanks. They have also supplied 155-millimetre self-propelled guns, Barak missiles and Python-4 air-to-air missiles to the Indian army, navy and air force. More recently, India purchased Tavor assault rifles, Galil sniper rifles and laser range-finding and targeting equipment from Israel. During the 1999 Kargil War in Kashmir, which pitted India against Pakistan, Israel is said to have sold the Indian army unmanned drones.

"India and Israel" as rendered in Hindi and Bengali.

Due to these and other sales, Israel has vaulted into second place, after Russia, as the largest supplier of arms to the Indian armed forces. Asked whether Israel can forge ahead of Russia, Danieli replied, "I don't know."

In the future, Israel's status as a major arms supplier could be imperilled if the United States, having dropped its arms embargo against India, aggressively courts the Indian market.

Israeli arms sales to India are clearly a source of concern to some Arabs. Recently, the editor of an Egyptian magazine, Al-Osboa, claimed that the disastrous tsunami in Southeast Asia, which has killed more than 150,000 people, was possibly caused by an Indian nuclear experiment in which Israeli and American experts participated.

Besides military sales, Israel has engaged India in high-level security co-operation, given their mutual fear of radical Islam and India's suspicion of Pakistan. "We've both suffered from terrorism for a long time," said Mayer, referring to Israel's struggle against Palestinian terrorism and India's conflict with Muslim separatists in Kashmir. "This dialogue works well." Late last year, India and Israel, both of which emerged from bloody partitions, held their fourth working group meeting on counter-terrorism in New Delhi. The Israeli delegation was led by Jeremy Issacharoff, the deputy director general for strategic affairs in the ministry of foreign affairs. His Indian counterpart, Meera Shankar, is a secretary in the ministry of external affairs.

As ties have deepened, India and Israel have exchanged reciprocal visits of senior military and political figures.

In 1995 and 1996, the commanders of the Israeli and Indian air forces paid each other official visits. In 1997, a year after the director of the Indian Defence Research and Development Organization visited Israel, India dispatched its first military attaché to its embassy in Tel Aviv. Among the Israeli officials who have visited India in recent years have been Ariel Sharon, the prime minister; Silvan Shalom, the foreign minister; Ezer Weizman, the then president, and Shimon Peres, the then minister for regional co-operation. Indian officials who have travelled to Israel have included Jaswant Singh, the foreign minister; L.K. Advani, the home minister, and Brajesh Mishra, the prime minister's principal secretary.

Although these visits have contributed to better mutual understanding, India, traditionally a partisan of the Palestinian cause and an opponent of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, continues to vote against Israel at the United Nations. "But India does not sponsor anti-Israel resolutions anymore," said Danieli.

India's more balanced approach toward the Arab-Israeli dispute was also reflected at the 2001 Durban conference on racism, when the Indian delegate helped thwart Arab attempts to virulently censure Israel in its final resolution.

India recognized Israel in 1950 when Jawaharlal Nehru, the prime minister, extended de jure recognition to the new Jewish state. India, a secular democracy, refrained from opening an embassy in Tel Aviv. But Israel maintained a trade-cum consular office in Mumbai (Bombay).

The Congress Party, which ruled India for decades and swept back to power last May, was somewhat hostile to Israel. Non-aligned in international affairs, India regarded Zionism as a western colonial idea. India's aloofness toward Israel was also a function of three other key factors: its reliance on Middle Eastern oil, its dependence on remittances from Indian workers in Arab states and its sensitivity to its huge Muslim population. Nehru's friendship with Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, combined with the Six Day War and Israel's identification with the policies of the United States, intensified India's pro-Arab stance.

But all that changed in one swift stroke in the early 1990s as the Soviet Union – India's ally – collapsed, the Cold War ended and the Madrid Middle East peace process was launched. India's then prime minister, P.V. Narasimha Rao, who died last month at 83, liberalized India's state-controlled economy and, in deciding to improve relations with Washington, established formal ties with Israel. Rao's successors, the leaders of the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata party, upgraded relations with Israel, and since then, tens of thousands of Israeli tourists have descended on India.

Surveying the sea change since 1992, Danieli observed, "Our relations are certainly satisfactory. We've seen a continuous growth and deepening of our bilateral relations in an unprecedented manner." And, as other diplomats in the Israeli embassy suggested, even better days lie ahead for Israel's increasingly important relationship with India.

Largest concentration of poor Jews live in north Bathurst corridor

Report profiles poverty in the Greater Toronto Area

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

More than twenty-five per cent of Jews who live in the Bathurst Street corridor between Finch and Steeles Avenue on or west of Bathurst Street are living below the poverty line. They represent the largest proportion of poor Jews in the GTA, followed by those who live on Bathurst or west of Bathurst between Wilson and Sheppard and those in the downtown core.

These are some of the findings from a report written by Charles Shahar and published by UJA Federation, based on data collected from the 2001 census.

There are approximately 20,000 Jews living below the poverty line in the Greater Toronto Area, as defined by Statistics Canada, which considers a family of four in the GTA to be living below the poverty line if household income is less than $34,572.

According to Shahar, the high percentage of poor Jews living on north Bathurst Street is likely due to the large senior and immigrant populations in that area.

Eric Kirsh of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), a partner agency of UJA Federation, points to other factors for the high incidence of disadvantaged Jews living in that district.

"One of the issues our clients face is that most of them want to remain in the Bathurst Street corridor because of their Jewish culture," said Kirsh. "So, even if there is affordable housing in other areas, they would prefer to wait where they are. Add to that the fact that there is already a shortage of affordable housing along the corridor."

North of the city, only 7.6 per cent of Jews living in Vaughan are poor.

Of the roughly 6,000 Jews living downtown, almost 19 per cent are considered poor.

"The level of Jewish poverty in Toronto is lower than most other major Jewish communities in Canada," said Shahar. "It is lower than that for the Montreal Jewish community (18.4%), Vancouver (14%), and Winnipeg (12.4 %). On the other hand, in terms of absolute numbers, there are more poor Jews living in Toronto than any other Jewish center in Canada."

"We know that there are both long and short-term solutions to this issue," said Kirsh. "JF&CS does everything from helping to offset a disadvantaged family's arrears in electricity or rent to keep them from being evicted, to the long-term solution of helping those clients who are employable, upgrade their work skills and re-enter the workforce."

UJA Federation will be spending over $3.1 million this year to assist Toronto's vulnerable.

CHAT students mind their business

Drawing on his background in business, and seeing various clubs thriving at CHAT, Jordan Hoffman, CHAT's Economics and Business Studies teacher, decided that students needed some practical business experience so he created the Business Club.

The mandate of the club is to provide students with real-world business experience through hands-on, entrepreneurial projects while raising money for charities.

Currently boasting an active membership of over 70 students ranging from grades 9-12, the Business Club has already forged successful business relationships including Obusforme, Colonel Wong Chinese Food and a Toronto sushi restaurant, satisfying not only the bottom line, but their taste buds as well.

Obusforme was generous enough to give backpacks to CHAT on consignment that club members have been selling to their schoolmates for a profit. The club also receives pre-packaged sushi and Chinese food, which they sell for lunches – and a profit - at the school.

Led by grade 12 students Josh Zagdanski, Carolyn Freedman, and Ben Rosen, the majority of the profits from these ventures are donated to charitable organizations. In addition, a small percentage is set aside to invest in areas that will enhance school spirit.

"Profit is the key motivator for businesses in the real world. The challenge here was in motivating teens to put in the enormous time required to create successful business ventures," says Hoffman. "By empowering the students to decide which charities the profits would go to, they became incredibly motivated."

"The success of these ventures has allowed us to make generous contributions," said Zagdanski. It is extremely gratifying to see our goals realized and to make a real contribution to our community."

The members of the Club recently decided to make a $1,000 donation to UJA, which provides substantial support for CHAT. "This year, we wanted to give back to UJA, who provides continued support to our school. Many of the students here volunteer time for the UJA. The UJA has such a close connection to CHAT, Toronto and Israel. We felt that it was important for us to make a financial contribution," said Freedman.

For their next venture, Ashley Orfus and Justine Grossman have been designing a line of CHAT clothing that will include sweatshirts, t-shirts, sweatpants, caps, as well as a kippa.

Respirator donated to Israeli hospital a lifesaver

Hadar Gitlin, a 22-year-old security guard was on duty in an Afula shopping mall in October 2003, when a suicide bomber struck at the mall entrance, taking with her three innocent lives while sending more than 70 to the Ha' Emek Medical Centre.

This respiratory ventilator - one of three donated through Toronto's 2002 Israel Emergency Campaign - helped save the life of a young Israeli woman following a terror attack.

Gitlin was subsequently kept alive in the Ha'Emek Medical Centre Intensive Care Unit (ICU) with the help of a respiratory ventilator – one of three donated through Toronto's IEC.

"Thanks to the timely generosity of Toronto's Jewish community, we were fortunate to have acquired a state-of-the –art respiratory ventilator that helped us to save the life of Hadar," said Dr. Ami Lev, the head of Ha'Emek Medical Centre's ICU. "We salute the people of Toronto for standing by us in our hour of need."

UJA's Tsunami Relief Fund tops $1.4 million

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tsunami Relief Fund has topped $1.4 million, including $800,000 in cash donations and another $600, 000 in the direct donation of medical supplies by a single contributor.

Torontonian Walter Arbib, CEO of the SkyLink Group - a leading consolidator and tour operator in North America, committed $600,000 to the purchase of medical supplies already shipped to various countries that were devastated by the December 26 tsunami that killed over 155,000 people and displaced millions in Southeast Asia.

"We do our part with humanitarian work," said Arbib, indicating that his company provided Canada's Disaster Assistance Response Team (DART) with the transportation to reach the devastated area, in addition to supplying transportation for other relief missions over the years to Somalia, Sarajevo and Cambodia, just to name a few. "Our staff sees first hand what goes on, so it is only natural that we lend a hand in this instance."

In 1988, SkyLink Aviation was formed to provide aircraft and logistical support to government agencies and world aid organizations.

Arbib joined more than 3,500 other donors to the UJA Federation Tsunami Disaster Relief Fund and a strong outpouring of support by Jewish federations across North America, which raised over $2 million US, since the catastrophe. More than 50 communities of every size have launched mailbox drives to raise funds for non-sectarian tsunami aid by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the overseas arm of the Jewish community that provides relief and promotes Jewish renewal in more than 60 countries.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's total cash contribution to JDC represents over a quarter of the amount of funds raised by North American federations.

Recovery work to take minimum five years JDC estimates in Southeast Asia

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Since the relief effort began following the tsunami disaster in Southeast Asia, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) – UJA Federation's overseas partner – has been working around the clock to assess the damage and to determine the allocations of funds to help those whose lives have been ravaged. Currently, eight JDC employees are on the ground, including Judy Amit, JDC Country Director for India.

"It's been extremely emotional," said Amit in a telephone conversation with Jewish Toronto from Sri Lanka. "It's exactly as you see it on television - it looks like a war zone. The devastation is horrendous."

Amit was also in India's coastal villages that were affected by the tsunami. For several days, she was with representatives of Caritas – the Catholic equivalent of JDC – assessing the damage and overseeing the distribution of emergency relief kits, provided in part by JDC allocations, to small villages where livelihoods – primarily salt farming, lime manufacture and fishing – have been decimated.

"The tsunami flooded the salt farms, causing damage and a loss of the crop," Amit said. "Many of the fishermen in the area have lost their boats and nets, and a new situation is also developing: some village residents are requesting relief, claiming that the government is not allowing them to go out to sea, even though their boats and nets are intact. Mostly they are so traumatized by what happened they are now scared of the sea. For some people in this area, the tsunami has become known as the 'Killer Wave.'"

Dr. William Recant, Assistant Executive Vice President of JDC – whose background includes disaster relief work in Ethiopia, Kosovo and Argentina – explained that the current focus is on emergency relief activities, but he cautions that there is much intermediate and long-term work to be done, which, he estimates, will take a minimum of five years.

"The task is to spend the money, spend it right away, and make sure it goes to those who really need it," explained Recant. "Maybe 10-15 percent will be spent in the next three weeks. The next third will be spent over the next three months."

As a result, a large portion of funds will be retained for intermediate-term rehabilitation, such as rebuilding schools, clinics, or orphanages when the time is right.

"When donors ask 'where is my money going?' the answer is 'we will not know for a long time,'" said Recant. "Currently, $500,000 has been spent for immediate relief through parishes and networks that we trust. We have our professionals on the ground assessing for the next phase which is reconstruction.

Recant praised the tremendous response of the global Jewish population, which has collectively raised over $10 million dollars, $6 million from JDC, following the disaster.

Global Jewish Coalition established

JDC is overseeing the establishment of The Jewish Coalition for Asia Tsunami Relief, which will allow North American Jewish organizations to coordinate efforts, avoid duplication, and make the best use of donor dollars. To date more than 30 organizations have joined this coalition. For more information please view the website at www.jcdr.org

Residential group home for troubled youth opened

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A residential group home for troubled Jewish youth was dedicated recently in honour of Yechezkel "Chezi" Goldberg, a Toronto native who was killed in a terrorist bus bombing in Jerusalem last year.

"Chezi's Corner" will be home to four young people for up to six months each while also serving as the venue for day programs for local youth, said Ed Schild, executive director of Regesh Family and Child Services, a private not-for-profit agency that operates the home.

During the six-month programs, residents will be taught life and social skills to enable them to become productive members of society and will be encouraged to become mentors to the next group of young people in need of guidance and support, Schild said.

The group home, located in Thornhill near the BAYT synagogue, will provide a long term legacy to Goldberg, who worked with troubled youth in Jerusalem, Schild said.

"I was very touched when he was murdered," he said. "We were working on this project at the time and I thought this would be a nice legacy."

Schild knew Goldberg for about 30 years, ever since Goldberg was his student in grades 5 and 6 at Associated Hebrew School. They kept in touch after Goldberg immigrated to Israel eight years ago. Schild visited him several times and the two found common interests as Schild had also dedicated himself to helping troubled youths.

While in Israel, Goldberg, 41, carved out a reputation as a social worker and special education counsellor working with young people. A father of seven, he also hosted a call-in radio show, wrote a newspaper column ("Chezi's Corner") and sponsored an annual songfest during Sukkot. Along with 11 other passengers, he was killed while riding on bus number 19 in Jerusalem.

At the time, his brother, Ronn, criticized the Canadian government for refusing to send a diplomatic official to the family's shivah, because the Goldberg home was in Betar Illit, across the Green Line from pre-1967 Israel. Ronn Goldberg called on Canada to display "moral clarity" in condemning violence against civilians and putting humanitarian gestures ahead of political calculations.

Yechezkel "Chezi" Goldberg

Schild said Chezi's Corner will focus on assisting young people who want to change the direction of their lives. There are many Jewish kids who are estranged from their families, who live with relatives or friends, who hang out in malls and at convenience stores, and who need help to put their lives in order, he said.

Chezi worked with similarly troubled youth in Israel, including many from Canada and the United States who had been sent by their parents to Israeli yeshivas in the hope the experience would straighten them out. However, "the problems followed them to Israel," Schild said.

Chezi had the uncanny ability to connect with kids and help them resolve their problems. "He had a wonderful way of communicating with kids without turning them off. His death was a tremendous loss to troubled youth," Schild said.

Chezi's Corner will offer young people in the residential program a kosher home and the option of strengthening their Jewish identities through various observances, but the observances will not be coercive. Compromise and respecting the youth's decisions is one part of gaining their trust, Schild said.

The young people will work on social skills, conflict resolution and anger management. Career counselling will also be offered.

Speaking at the dedication ceremony, Ruth Goldberg, Chezi's mother, said the group home offered "hope and promise, continuing my son's dedicated work for at-risk Jewish youth and young adults."

A thirst for Torah

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

When the Jews left the Red Sea and journeyed into the desert, they complained of thirst. After three days in the desert without water, they were thirsty. But not just for water – they were also thirsty for Torah.

The surface meaning of the story of the Torah is perfectly understandable, but the rabbis of the Talmud were not satisfied to take it at its plain meaning.

The Torah says that after three days' journey in the desert, the people complained to Moses that they were thirsty for water. He brought that complaint to HaShem and they were provided with water.

A perfectly reasonable story. And it is there to teach us that the people had divine help in their journey.

However, the Talmud says that water is a symbol of Torah. So the people travelled three days journey without Torah and were thirsty for Torah. Therefore, Moses established that we should not go three days without reading the Torah, so we read it in shul on Monday, Thursday and Shabbat.

That is an interesting explanation – because the Jews didn't have the Torah then! The story of how Moses established that we should not go three days without reading the Torah took place before the Jews got to Mount Sinai – after getting through the Red Sea and on the way to Mount Sinai. How could they have been thirsty for Torah before they had received the Torah? How could Moses institute Torah reading before they received the Torah? And besides, isn't it a mitzvah to learn Torah every day? Then, why did he not institute Torah learning every day, or at least emphasize Torah learning every day? What is the difference between Torah learning every day and Torah reading in shul every three days?

There are two aspects to Torah – the content and the experience. The content – thou shalt not murder – and the experience of divine communication. The content of love your neighbour and the experience of a covenant.

On leaving Egypt, the Jewish people had not yet received the content of the Torah – that would come at Sinai. But they had experienced the comfort of divine protection at the Red Sea and had experienced the warmth of divine intervention to protect them. They had felt the embrace of the divine in wrapping them up and removing them from Egypt. And as they travelled in the desert, they missed that – they were thirsty for the experience of the divine. They were thirsty for the splitting of the Red Sea.

So Moses instituted Torah reading in shul – not for its content but for its experience. For the content of Torah, you must learn every day. But for the experience of Torah – for the notion of divine revelation, of divine communication and of HaShem's special relationship with the Jewish people – for that experience Moses instituted a public reading of Torah. And this experience you can't have every day; every three days is sufficient.

The people had a thirst for divine experience, and public reading of the Torah is a dramatization of the experience of the divine every three days. And for that, we are all thirsty.

Imams and rabbis meet

Guest Voice

By RABBI HOWARD S. JOSEPH

I was one of the fortunate – or should I say, blessed – religious leaders gathered in Brussels last week for the historic conference of Imams and Rabbis for Peace.

The conference was sponsored by the Hommes de Parole Foundation of Paris and was under the patronage of Albert II, King of the Belgians and Mohammed VI, King of Morocco.

As the only Canadian rabbi – there were no Canadian imams – I felt a special responsibility to maximize the opportunity to interact with imams, sheiks and kadis from almost the entire Muslim world – from Morocco to Uzbekistan. Unfortunately, some Middle Eastern states, including Lebanon, Syria, Iraq and Libya, were not represented.

Among the outstanding Jewish personalities in attendance were the former chief rabbis of Israel and France. After many decades of involvement with Christian-Jewish dialogue, this was my first encounter with Muslim religious leaders.

About 100 imams and rabbis were in attendance, as well as about 70 selected experts, including Dean B. Barry Levy of the McGill University faculty of religious studies. It was apparent that many of the participants had never before participated in any form of inter-religious encounter.

Their willingness to meet reflected the great sense of urgency to give voice to Muslim and Jewish religious leaders who wished to recapture the contemporary moment from those who have held our religions hostage to violent and extreme attitudes and actions. We agreed that these attitudes and actions have disgraced our religions and diminished respect for religious faith itself. I hope that the same urgency would lead us here in Canada to hold similar Muslim-Jewish encounters and dialogue.

We asserted the genuine voice of our scriptures that establish the dignity of human beings as the fundamental consequence of religious faith. That is the standard by which true faith must judge itself. The imams and rabbis based this idea on the concepts found in the Qu'ran and Bible – of human beings being created in the image of God. This was one of the commonalities among the many rediscovered by the two faith communities that for so long have lived together and have only recently been moved apart by narrow and intolerant elements in our communities.

We accepted the challenge expressed by Andre Azoulay, adviser to King Mohammed VI of Morocco, that we must rebuild the ethical and moral space that is common to Islam and to Judaism.

After the first day of dialogue, it was clear to all the participants that the genuine voice of faith and morality was present. As an old talmudic dictum states, "words that come from the heart will enter the heart." The personal interaction among the rabbis and imams grew between sessions, during coffee breaks and at the dinner tables. We rapidly moved into a relaxed and friendly mode of encounter.

The final resolution called upon all faith communities to renounce violence in the name of their religion and to seek peaceful means to resolving disputes. (The resolution and other related documents can be found at hommesdeparole.org.) The religious leaders present pledged to take this message back to their individual communities and begin to build a more hopeful future.

Future conferences are planned to widen the circle of participants and a joint committee was formed to implement the initiatives taken in Brussels and to monitor events and issues that affect Muslim and Jewish relations.

We proceeded in the knowledge that there are dangers and the risk of failure in the path of peace we have chosen. We prayed that the atmosphere of openness and reconciliation that we established would continue in many joint efforts for the well-being of the world and to restore respect for our faiths. We have tried to move from a situation that appeared to be a Holy War to one that envisions a Holy Peace.

Flight to Shanghai

For Jews desperate to leave Nazi Germany, the International Settlement in Shanghai offered refuge and haven. Although the area was occupied by Japan, an imperialist nation friendly with Germany, the influx of Jews was not curtailed.

As a result, about 22,000 Jewish refugees settled there, joining the 7,200 Sephardi and Russian Jews who had long been resident in the city.

Among those who made their way to Shanghai was three-year-old Hannelore Heinemann Headley and her parents. Following Kristallnacht, the Nazis had closed her father's popular Berlin bookstore. Frantically, the family managed – with great difficulty and some luck – to obtain precious travel tickets on a ship bound for the Orient.

Conditions in the city's Hongkew ghetto were harsh, but Jewish life flourished. "Refugees opened bakeries, cafés, nightclubs, newspapers and journals. Birthdays and holidays were celebrated, anniversaries remembered, and there were weddings and bar mitzvot by the score. Well-known musicians and other performers found that they could put their artistic training to good use in a variety of ways and were able to earn enough to at least stay alive."

Resourceful and enterprising, Headley's father was able to re-establish his successful book business.

In the early '40s, the Nazi regime tried to persuade the Japanese to bring the "Final Solution" into effect. But, surprisingly, the Japanese who saw themselves as protectors of the Jews under their control resisted the Nazis' murderous plans.

At war's end, the arrival of triumphant American troops led to improvements in living conditions and the influx of relief groups and some Jewish organizations. With their arrival came much-needed food and clothing. The heartbreaking task of tracing lost relatives in Europe also began in earnest.

Headley's family decided to remain in Shanghai during the postwar years. It was a city that seemed to promise opportunity and freedom. However, in 1949, Shanghai fell into the hands of the Chinese People's Liberation Army, and the family, facing a variety of restrictions, was convinced they could not endure the rigours of the new regime.

On the verge of immigrating to Canada, the author's father was suddenly arrested and not released until after a year's imprisonment. "While in prison, the authorities had attempted to prove that Papa was a spy for the Americans and that he had sent coded information in books and newspapers out of the country," Headley writes. "They must have realized, however, that he did not have the personality nor the proficiency in the language to be a spy."

In 1951, the author, then 16, and her parents made their way to Canada – for them a new and exciting land of hope and promise.

The book's title refers to the colour of the author's hair, unusual in China. She remembers that women used to come up to her to touch her hair to make sure it was real.

The owner of two bookstores in St. Catharines, Headley has brought to life a little-known chapter in Jewish history. Her engaging and many-sided account of how a child and teenager grew up in a strange place during a turbulent time is a rewarding reading experience.

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"[The tsunami] is an expression of God's great ire with the world. The world is being punished for wrongdoing – be it people's needless hatred of each other, lack of charity, moral turpitude." –Shlomo Amar, Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi. [http://msnbc.msn.com/id/6771491/]

Today, I continue looking at Jewish thought surrounding suffering, faith and Judaism.

Perhaps the best-known contemporary writer on the topic of suffering is Rabbi Harold Kushner, author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People. While Rabbi Amar clearly sees God's hand in the events that have rocked the world, Rabbi Kushner has a very different view. God "is limited in what He can do by laws of nature and by the evolution of human nature and human moral freedom. I no longer hold God responsible for illnesses, accidents and natural disasters, because I realize that I gain little and I lose so much when I blame God for those things." Rabbi Kushner suggests "that the bad things that happen to us in our lives do not have a meaning when they happen to us. They do not happen for any good reason, which would cause us to accept them willingly. But we can give them a meaning. We can redeem these tragedies from senselessness by imposing meaning on them." [http://tinyurl.com/3wq6e]

Rabbi Boruch Clinton says we should be careful before we conclude that something bad is happening to someone good. He suggests asking yourself three questions first.

- Is this something really bad? Perhaps losing your wallet at the airport kept you from a flight that was destined to crash. More subtly, perhaps the experience of losing the wallet enriched your quality as a human being.
- Is this someone really good?... What does he do when no one's looking? In other words, we just don't know enough about any one person – or even about ourselves – to judge.
- Is a tranquil, comfortable life really "good?" [http://tinyurl.com/3p42f]

When we ask, "Where was God" when a million children were murdered in the Holocaust, Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg warns we must not try to reach a quick answer. "Any easy affirmation of God would appear to mock the burning children. Any easy denial of God would appear to turn the children's deaths into a gigantic travesty. A simple denial of God would appear to deny the reality of redemption in our time and the validation of biblical promise by contemporary fulfillment." [http://tinyurl.com/6ey3p]

If questions about suffering and death are so troubling for adults, how do you explain them to children? After hurricanes battered Florida last year, the Union for Reform Judaism created its Response to Natural Disaster: A Jewish Approach. Geared toward parents and educators, it tries to help address questions from children within a Jewish framework. It includes traditional texts, a methodology for working with children, suggested activities for children to assist in the healing process and a comprehensive reading list. [http://urj.org/educate/disasterresponse/]

Nesaniel Safran's suffering didn't make headlines around the world. Safran had grown up watching countless old Jimmy Stewart movies whose message is that if one believes strongly enough, everything will be just fine. But things weren't fine for Safran and despite his faith, his son Yisroel Nachman died. "I had been pushed to a brink, placed at a crossroads where there was no standing still. My choice was clear – either claim my faith, or abandon it... I found myself drawn, for the first time, to the many teachings of the Torah that speak of emunah, of faith... For the Jew, faith means putting forth our best effort and then accepting whatever results occur.

"I discovered a sort of patient, bittersweet acceptance and even love of life, and an inner strength that comes with the realization that we don't control reality. We can only hope to respond in the most elevated manner possible to the challenge before us." [www.aish.com/spirituality/odysseys/Faith_Healing.asp]

'Israelis know what to do in case of attack'

"But in Israel, so much is experiential. Everyone knows someone who was killed or injured in a terrorist attack, and everyone knows exactly what to do in case of emergency."

The impetus for the visit came mainly from Canada's experience with fallout from the 9/11 attacks and from the SARS outbreak of 2003.

Last September, on the recommendations of a federally commissioned report on SARS, Ottawa established the Public Health Agency of Canada to build expertise in health and disaster preparedness. The government earmarked $5 million for emergency response teams, $4 million for a national emergency stockpiling system and $7 million for improved laboratory capacities.

Bennett said the time has come to "inculcate a culture of emergency preparedness" in Canada like the one in Israel. "Our experience with SARS is different from theirs with mass casualties, obviously, but being ready has to become part of our mindset."

Israelis may be wary, but at least they organize quickly and know what to do in case of attack, she said.

Also on the trip were Dr. Sylvie Stachenko of the Public Health Agency of Canada; Dr. Isra Levy of the Canadian Medical Association; MP Michael Savage, a member of the standing committee on health; Winnipeg MP Anita Neville, a member of the standing committee on justice, human rights, public safety and emergency preparedness; Gary Goldberg of the Canadian Institute of Health Research; and Hilary Geller, chief of staff to Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan.

Bennett and members of her team toured facilities on the cutting edge of disaster readiness and response in Israel. Among them were the Israel Center for Disease Control, Magen David Adom, the Hadassah Medical Centre and – the highlight for participants – the Israel Center for Medical Simulation, where teams of health professionals not only treat mass casualties but train teams to respond to various situations, including bioterror attacks and chemical warfare.

Asked what the Tel Hashomer-based facility can simulate, Bennett said, "You name it. Everything from a pelvic exam to giving bad news to a full-blown bioterror incident... even gas coming out of the vents. It was spectacular."

The Canadians also met with hospital administrators. Israeli hospitals, Bennett related, must by law be prepared to accommodate a "surge capacity" of 20 per cent – or 120 per cent of overall bed and surgical capacity.

That level of readiness "would be viewed as pretty stiff in Canada," she conceded.

At the Hadassah Medical Centre in Jerusalem, "the children's waiting room is wired for oxygen and can turn instantly into an emergency room," Bennett noted. "All the hospitals have drills and plans for everything from anthrax to x-rays. And there's a willingness to train and practise."

Some of the officials the Canadians were scheduled to meet weren't in Israel, having been dispatched to Southeast Asian countries to deliver humanitarian aid to the tsunami victims. Israel sent search, rescue, welfare and medical teams to stricken areas, as well as at least three El Al 747s, each loaded with 60 tonnes of supplies flown to Indonesia, Thailand and Sri Lanka.

Bennett, Canada's junior health minister, also held talks with Dan Naveh, Israel's minister of health, and with Haim Divon, Israel's former ambassador to Canada and a one-time deputy director general of Mashav, the Israel Centre for International Co-operation.

Bennett said she realizes there are many discrepancies between Israel and Canada, not least of all the massive geographical differences between the two, and the difficulty of establishing a cross-Canada communications network of health providers.

"We knew post-SARS that we had to get information out to the trenches right away," Bennett said. "In Israel, doctors know where to go at all times and they can be reached at any time. After SARS, we discovered that some [Canadian] doctors didn't have pagers and didn't have fax machines."

But equally important, she said, is the need to alter perceptions.

"Canadians grumble at a fire drill. [Preparedness] is a tougher sell. The expectation in Israel is that emergency preparedness is everyone's responsibility."

Bennett said she will strike a roundtable to apply the lessons learned in Israel.

"We have a lot to learn," she said.

Harvard prof to discuss life in the Diaspora

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ruth Wisse sees Jewish life in the Diaspora as a unique political experiment.

"The fact is that no other people has ever survived for almost 2,000 years as a nation without the staples of national existence, including land, a central political authority and a means of self-defence," the Harvard University professor said in an interview last week from her home in Cambridge, Mass.

Ruth Wisse

On Jan. 27, Wisse will discuss "Life in the Diaspora: The Glorious Jewish Experiment" at Adath Israel Congregation in an event presented by UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy. Part of her talk will focus on the role of language. She noted that Yiddish – her area of academic expertise – is "by no means the only language that Jews created in the Diaspora."

Wisse, a former CJN columnist, has become known for political advocacy as well as for her academic career. Before becoming the first professor of Yiddish studies at Harvard, she taught Yiddish and English literature at McGill University and helped found its Jewish studies department.

Yiddish literature has imbued Wisse with "a sense of responsibility" that fuels her outspokenness on issues such as anti-Semitism on campus and Israel's need for security.

"In the same way that other people find it difficult to express themselves on these issues, I find it difficult not to," she said. "If you care about the world, you have to stop the war against the Jews."

Wisse, who serves as an adviser for Harvard Students for Israel and other student groups, says she is encouraged by increased student advocacy for Israel on her campus over the past few years, but she noted that "very few" of her colleagues have taken on that type of role.

Although she said she has the highest regard for them academically, "I wish that they would speak up."

The Israel Defence Forces has done "a phenomenal job" defending Israel militarily, she said, "but there has been at least as great if not a much greater assault on the idea of Israel and its legitimacy. Unfortunately, there has been no parallel defence force on the part of Jews in North America. To my mind, that war of ideas is at least as important, if not more so."

A Montrealer who spent the first few years of her life in an area of Romania that is now part of Ukraine, Wisse taught Yiddish and English literature at McGill University until 11 years ago.

Much of her time is devoted to her teaching, which is a full-time position. "Students [at Harvard] are extraordinarily good, curious and passionate," she said. "The better the students, the more they require, and the more one wants to do simply in the area of teaching, let alone scholarship."

She credits her initial interest in Yiddish literature to luck. "Good fortune drew me to Yiddish literature: very interesting people and writers, excellent teachers, and parents who valued this highly."

She was also inspired by a meeting with Avrom Sutzkever – "one of the greatest Yiddish poets of all time" – on a 1957 visit to Israel, two years before she began her graduate studies.

Now a dual citizen of Canada and the United States, she says she is grateful to Canada, which she referred to as a wonderful country.

"But," she added, "I think it's such a great privilege to live in a country whose president for the first time seems to understand that you have to take the war to the enemy."

Is day school tuition a form of birth control?

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
CJN Staff

School Parents SPEAK

"So, are you having any more?"

Friends and relatives – particularly those with kids or those thinking about having them – often ask me that question.

It usually comes after I've told them some cute or shocking story about my two boys – one a serious and studious six-year-old who is settling nicely into Grade 1, the other a rambunctious, smiley four-year-old who is getting used to missing his naps in junior kindergarten.

My wife and I initially planned to have three kids, but reality has hit us square in the face in our quest to do our reproductive part for Jewish continuity.

Never mind that one more kid would leave us hopelessly outnumbered, or that we might forever be buried under mounds of laundry, or that – as two working parents – meal preparation would cut severely into our sleep time.

We knew kids would be a lot of work and that we would experience things our stay-at-home moms never did. And we knew young boys could be a challenge.

Yet, we might have taken the plunge if it weren't for the sheer expense of raising children – and for us, the cost of a Jewish day school education is a big part of that.

Even if we could find a way to endure three years of daycare fees for a third child, sending three kids to day school would cost more than $30,000 a year. That's more than many average after-tax salaries, particularly among working couples where one parent is the lead income earner and the other takes more responsibility in the home.

Around tax time, it gets depressing to read news reports that say our household income ranks among the country's highest, because we're barely making ends meet with two kids in Jewish day school. There are also limits to what public servants and journalists like my wife and me can earn, at least if we want to limit our hours and stay involved in our children's lives. (Note to self: remember to ask the editor for that $20,000 raise – just for being me.)

It's especially tough as we begin to worry about how we'll eventually replace the family car – a 1996 Nissan Sentra – never mind finding the money for a shul membership (something we can't afford right now), modest bar mitzvah celebrations, day camp fees, music lessons, swim lessons, JCC memberships, rising utility bills and the premium we all pay for the privilege of living in The Big Sprawl.

A third child? The bottom line is just too squeezed, and the biggest line-item in the budget is tuition.

The Toronto Jewish community simply must to find a way to help reduce fees, because a day school education, particularly for kids from non-Orthodox homes, is probably the single best predictor of future Jewish affiliation, and the numbers show that day school enrolment has dropped for the fourth straight year.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's allocation to Jewish day school education may be the highest on the continent, but it's not enough, and it's largely aimed – as it should be, in the absence of more money – at providing subsidies to families in the most need. Middle class families are largely left on their own.

I'm aware that Ontario is the only province that doesn't provide some kind of funding to religion-based schools or programs, and that one religion is funded while all others are not. Nevertheless, as we have seen with the Liberal government's repeal of the Tories' private school education tax credit, it's strategically questionable to rely on politicians to fix the problem, particularly in a time of tight public budgets.

As well, the tax credit was obviously meant to buy Jewish votes for a party with policies that many felt were contrary to Jewish values, and it made the Jewish community a sideshow in the contentious debate on the future of public education.

Elsewhere, notably in Cleveland, community fundraising has helped to create an endowment fund that has helped cut tuition at some day schools by 45 per cent for this year. (In one case, tuition was reduced to $5,500 US from the expected amount of $10,000 without the endowment). In Boston, at least part of a $45-million dollar gift from a local group of anonymous families may go, at least in part, toward a similar endowment, though details about that gift and how it will be allocated have yet to be determined.

Why can't we fundraise for an endowment to reduce fees here?

In Toronto, it seems fundraising priorities have been skewed toward new buildings rather than making sure there are enough Jews to fill them in the future.

As day school parents struggle, the community plans to spend $100 million tearing down and rebuilding the Bathurst JCC, and $150 million building a huge new campus at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill.

Here's my suggestion: why not refurbish the Bathurst JCC – or cut back on the scale of the project – and build a more modest campus in York Region. (The Weldrick project is often justified in terms of an ever-growing GTA Jewish population. But you have to wonder how much more we can grow, given low Jewish birthrates and stabilizing migration rates from other cities in Canada, particularly Montreal. As well, there are limits to sprawl and a large chunk of York Region's Jews seem to live south of Highway 7, and hence almost as close to the Bathurst JCC as to Weldrick.)

With the money saved from scaling back these mega-projects, the community could start a sizeable tuition endowment fund and build from there.

As to whether we plan to have any more children, such a fund may arrive too late for us.

But I look forward to playing basketball with my 10 grandchildren at the Vaughan JCC in 2035.

Daniel Wolgelerenter is a CJN copy editor and a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. His two boys attend the Toronto Heschel School.

Academics in Israel: what we did on vacation

By ED MORGAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

The latest in a series of missions in which Canadian academics make the rounds of Israeli universities concluded last week, culminating in results that are more than just "academic."

The visit included a lunchtime ceremony where the presidents of the Hebrew University and the University of Manitoba put their signatures on research and exchange agreements involving the U of M and Hebrew U's Braun School of Public Health and Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

The cutting-edge research and the outstanding quality of Israel's seven major universities combined to leave a profound impression on the team of visitors from Canadian academia. The visits have been an ongoing project of Canadian Jewish Congress, and this one comprised representatives from Bishop's, Manitoba, McGill, Ryerson, Saskatchewan, York, and switching from my CJC kippah to my university mortar board, U of T. The trip was generously underwritten by Gerry Schwartz, Milton Harris and Julie Koschitzky together with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

As with previous academic missions, the objectives of the visit were to promote academic exchanges, joint research projects and other types of co-operative activity between Canadian and Israeli universities. The visit also aimed to increase knowledge about the institutions and educational systems for higher learning in each country, and to enhance the awareness of Canadian educators about the State of Israel, its ancient history, modern accomplishments and future challenges.

This visit of Canadian academics differed in two important respects, however, from previous CJC university presidents missions. First, while two university presidents graced the group (Lorna Marsden of York and Emoke Szathmary of Manitoba), the majority of the more than 20 participants were researchers, professors and administrators at other senior levels. Secondly, while CJC has always in the past worked co-operatively with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Israel, this mission was a truly bi-national effort, organized as a direct partnership between CJC and the consulates general of Israel in Toronto and Montreal.

Originally the brainchild of Israeli Consul General Cobie Brosh and Prof. Irving Abella of York University, the mission aimed at matching specific faculty representatives from Canadian universities with their counterparts in Israel. The group presented an eclectic variety of disciplines spanning the humanities, social sciences, natural sciences and technology. Canada showed its expertise in subjects ranging from contemporary music to the science of grain storage, and from infectious diseases to the history of bullfighting. With several vice-presidents and directors of research and international exchange filling out the group, the mission facilitated interaction at both the macro- and micro-levels.

The Israeli foreign ministry did its part in ensuring that the Canadians enjoyed extensive sessions at Bar-Ilan University, Ben Gurion University, Haifa University, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Tel Aviv University, and the Weizmann Institute of Science. Out of these meetings came a number of invitations for guest lectureships, sabbatical visits, joint publications, graduate student exchanges and the like.

In addition to the customized meetings by department and faculty, discussions were held on each campus with the president, rectors and deans of research and inter-academic affairs on issues relating to the system of higher education in Israel, curricula, funding, student population, and research policy and focus. These sessions gave the Canadian and Israeli colleagues a chance to do what academics do best: kvetch about the government funding cutbacks that plague universities everywhere.

One morning was devoted to a session with Palestinian institutions of higher learning, organized by CJC in conjunction with Canada's Representative Office in Ramallah. Gathering at the fabled American Colony Hotel in east Jerusalem, the group met with representatives from Birzeit, Bethlehem, Al-Quds and An-Najah universities to learn about their specific areas of specialization and the general challenges they face. The Canadian participants came away with the hope that Canada can provide a bridge for productive trilateral exchanges bringing Israeli and Palestinian professors and students together in ways that might otherwise be difficult to achieve.

The group also received the benefit of expert briefings on Israel's political and strategic situation (including insights into the Palestinian election, which took place the last day of the visit) and extensive touring, including the Old City of Jerusalem, an IDF tour and briefing on the security fence, Yad Vashem, Christian sites in the Galilee, a Druze village near Haifa, Masada, the Golan Heights, and the Lebanese border.

The key to this kind of mission, of course, lies in the critical follow-up. To this end, the group did what all good Canadian academics are expected to do: it formed a committee. A working group was established comprising one representative from each university to develop common follow-up strategies. The hope is that the returnees from the mission, together with "alumni" from previous academic missions, can create a critical mass of scholarly exchanges that will make Canada and Israel commonplace features on each other's academic horizons.

It is evident to anyone who goes on such a visit that the academic communities in the two countries share much in the way of fundamental values and a commitment to equity and excellence in education. The goal is to harness these mutual features of academia in order to increase co-operation and contribute to the enrichment of both societies.

New teacher learns ropes at Soloveitchik Institute

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Avi Finegold, a former Hillel co-president at Concordia University, spent the two years after his 2002 graduation studying for private smichah, working on his master's degree in religion, and, for part of last year, teaching Talmud and Jewish thought at Herzliah High School in Montreal.

When he complained about a dearth of support programs for new teachers to a friend, it was suggested he check out a program in the Boston suburb of Brookline, Mass.

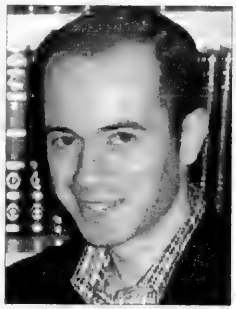
That's how Rabbi Finegold, a 27-year-old Montreal native with a degree in psychology, ended up at the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute, where he is spending this year in the Modern Orthodox institute's teaching fellowship program, now in its second year, as a recipient of the Morton Perl Fellowship.

He is the first Canadian in the program, which has three participants this year (another six took part last year).

The 10-month certificate program was developed in part because Judaic studies teachers "often do not have the same level of professional preparation as their secular studies counterparts," the institute's website says. Also, it noted, there is a shortage of properly qualified Judaic teachers.

"In the Orthodox world, it's not atypical for someone to come with a strong content background [but without sufficient teacher training]," said Jeremy Kahan, director of teacher education at the institute.

The program combines classroom experience with seminars on topics such as pedagogy. Students are paired with mentors who teach at the Maimonides School, the Modern Orthodox day school where the institute is housed, which was founded by Rabbi Soloveitchik in 1937.



Rabbi Avi Finegold

Depending on the time of year, fellows spend between eight and 20 hours a week teaching or observing in a day school classroom, Kahan said.

Participants are committed to teaching in North America for the next three years and receive assistance with job placement. However, Kahan noted, because of financial issues, the program may not be able to continue next year.

"God willing, there will be fellows the following year," he said.

The program is unique, Rabbi Finegold said, because of the amount of classroom experience, the combination of theory and practice, and the Modern Orthodox perspective. Now in his second placement at the Maimonides School, he has had classroom experience in a total of five grades.

His first experience as a Jewish educator was less formal: he served seven years as an adviser to the Orthodox youth group National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) while he was in CEGEP and then university.

"I really got a taste for teaching, and the opportunity opened up last year," he said. "This program is really preparing me in a way that [just] being a teacher never will."

Most important test of government is how it treats elderly: McGuinty as this offers us a better chance of minimizing the effects of their disability so they can live in the community for a longer time."

McGuinty said that when he told his own mother that he was coming to Baycrest she told him "to make sure you give them enough money."

The passion at Baycrest "is palatable. When it comes to expert care, nothing comes as close as the human hand. That is evident here," said McGuinty.

The most important test of a government is how it treats the elderly, he said.

"We are fortunate to live in the best province, but with that privilege comes the responsibility of looking out for one another.

"[Baycrest] is fulfilling that responsibility. You are officially launching a new model of care for today's elderly."

M.P.P. Mike Colle called the opening a monumental event for Baycrest. "We are keeping a promise to transform the way people age. [No other place] is privileged to have a Baycrest. The world is waiting for us."

New BBYO director comes full circle

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sharon Marcus

Sharon Marcus, new executive director of BBYO, Lake Ontario region, has come back to her roots.

Growing up in Mansfield, Ohio, Marcus, now a mother of two teenage sons, was one of three Jewish students in her class, and she got her first taste of Jewish communal life through BBYO.

"I had a bat mitzvah, but did not go to Jewish summer camp until I attended a summer program through BBYO."

It was the organization that led her to Canada, she says.

"After university, I visited BBYO friends in Edmonton. I liked it so much, I stayed. Eventually, I got a diploma in non-profit management and went to work for BBYO as regional vice-president. I was there for 12 years.

"It was never in my plans to to work in the Jewish community. My work just led me there."

In her new position, her mandate is to engage unaffiliated teens in a meaningful Jewish experience. "There are about 5,000 to 7,000 kids – pre- and post-bar mitzvah age – in the region who are not involved in a youth movement. I want to give them that connection."

When youth become involved in Jewish organizations it leaves a mark, she says. "They will continue on, and as adults they will lead active Jewish lives."

Currently, there are 100 active members in the region, and about 300 teens have come out to take part in social, sports, and cultural and Judaic programs.

As well, she says, the teens run fundraising campaigns for charities of their choice. "In the past, they ran a jam-a-thon, and the funds were earmarked for Magen David Adom. This year they are raising money for disaster relief and breast cancer research.

"Getting involved in this type of work gives kids leadership and administrative skills that they can take anywhere," Marcus says.

"It also a mitzvah for them to do something for someone else. It gets them away from themselves."

The organization is youth-led, she says. "The leaders are elected democratically, and staff is available to guide them.

"BBYO provided me with a wonderful experience when I was a kid, and now I want to build a relationship with the teens."

Building up the organization "is definitely my passion. It changed my life; it can change others as well."

HANDS-ON LEARNING: Omer Eshel, Israeli shaliach with Habonim Dror, Camp Gesher and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, leads a discussion with Grade 6 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School using an oversized map of Israel. Eshel has designed a pilot educational program called "Shelach," an acronym that stands for "sadeh l'om chevra," which means field or land, nationality and society. Students learn about these concepts in multimedia sessions that use dialogue, interactive activities and other hands-on educational methods. Bialik is the first school in North America to use Shelach in its regular curriculum to enhance the study of Jewish history.

Pair edit anthology on grief and healing

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Mara Koven was mourning the death of her 39-year-old husband and Liz Pearl was grieving the loss of her maternal grandmother when they decided to harness their pain in a creative way.

At a kickboxing class, Pearl approached Koven and said, "I know you must be going through hell, but I think I have an exciting project for us to work on that may be worthwhile."

From there, Pearl recounts, they went on to co-edit and publish Mourning Has Broken – A Collection of Creative Writing about Grief and Healing.

The anthology contains 50 original submissions about healing from the pain of losing a loved one. The writers share their thoughts and make the reader cry and laugh, but they always express their inner strength and insights about coping.

Pearl, who specializes in psychogeriatrics, expressive art therapies and adult education, says that she and Koven "firmly believe that creative writing can be an expressive and therapeutic medium of healing from grief."

The book includes submissions from Canada, Australia, Costa Rica, Holland, Israel and the United States. The authors, Pearl says, are mothers, fathers, wives, husbands, siblings, children, friends and caring citizens.

The book also includes a range of writing forms, including narrative, poetry, song, prayer, letters, lists, journal entries, eulogies and obituaries.

"Bereavement is inevitable to the human experience, so the creative healing process is potentially universal," says Koven, a writer whose postgraduate studies were in journalism and Jewish communal studies.

"Many of the people who submitted their works said, 'Even if you don't publish my work, I am eternally grateful for the opportunity to have participated in this valuable process.'"

Pearl adds, "We were able to learn from the grief of the authors, who bring support and solace to others. And although we're based in Toronto, we succeeded in reaching out to many internationally renowned bereavement professionals, including Rabbi Earl Grollman and Dr. Darcie Sims."

Longtime grief counsellor and educator Dr. Alan Wolfelt of Fort Collins, Colo., who wrote the forward to Mourning Has Broken, notes that story-writing and storytelling help the healing process.

"Tell the story of the death and you begin to acknowledge it," he writes. "Tell it 10 times and you begin to let it enter your heart. Tell it over and over and you find it becoming part of who you are."

Elsewhere in the book, Dr. Edward Pakes, a psychiatrist in Toronto who has worked with many bereaved individuals, defines mourning as "the active, deliberate process of digesting the indigestible grief after bereavement."

Pakes writes that he hopes readers will be partially healed by reading what contributors have written about their own experiences.

Kope Associates – "Kope" being a play on the word "cope" that's incorporates the first two letters of "Koven" and "Pearl" – has published a limited first edition of Mourning Has Broken, which is available at several local book stores, including Caversham Booksellers, Israel's and Negev Importing.

Pearl and Koven are currently completing the research and editorial work for their next collaboration, a collection of original writings by stroke survivors. The book will be released in June.

Most Jewish schools partner with public boards

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Seven of the 15 Jewish day school corporations have partnered with two Montreal-area school boards, and most of the rest are presently in "active negotiation" toward doing so, a FEDERATION CJA spokesperson said last week.

As reported in The CJN Dec. 16, the Quebec government has agreed to fund the cost of the general studies portion of the schools' curriculum at the same rate as that of public schools if they enter into "associate status" with a public school board, a contractual arrangement recognized in the provincial education act.

The government currently provides $5,200 per student in public schools. The Jewish schools were previously eligible for 60 per cent of that.

Bram Freedman, director of operations and strategic initiatives, said five day school corporations have partnered with the French-language Commission Scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys and two with the English-language Lester B. Pearson School Board.

The former are United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School, Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School, Akiva School, Ecole Maimonide and Solomon Schechter Academy, and the latter are Hebrew Academy and Hebrew Foundation School.

The associated Jewish schools keep 90 per cent of the government funding and 10 per cent goes to the two school boards.

Freedman said it is the hope of the federation, which had requested the increased funding from the government, that all the schools come on board, and do so fairly soon. Most of the remaining schools are Orthodox.

If all 15 school corporations participate, the total amount of new government money spent on Jewish education will rise by $10.5 million to $35 million a year.

Associated Jewish schools and their school boards are required to engage in formal cultural exchanges of students and professionals to fulfil the government's goal of promoting "rapprochement" between students attending parochial schools and those in the public system.

Freedman said the main reason that the federation, along with the Association of Jewish Day Schools and Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, pressed for associate status was the opportunity to engage in a structured cultural and professional relationship with their public counterparts.

He said he is pleased the majority so far have opted to partner with a francophone board.

"While the funding is important, the main focus is rapprochement," he said.

The increased funding will not mean a reduction in school fees, which average from $5,000 to $7,000 a year. The federation is encouraging the schools to keep their current fees and use the extra money to improve the overall quality of education, as well cover the cost of the joint programming with the school boards. "Each school can decide how it sees fit to invest these new funds," he said.

JPPS executive director Barry Rishikof indicated the schools will not be awash in money they do not know how to use. First of all, he said, the government funds elementary school teachers' salaries to a maximum of 23½ hours per week, while JPPS has a 35-hour week, including its Jewish studies curriculum. A similar gap exists at the high school level, he said.

The schools remain responsible for the entire cost of Jewish studies.

Government funding also does not cover such "auxiliary" services as teaching assistants and guidance counsellors, he said.

He stressed that JPPS's interest in associate status was not purely for more money, but a genuine desire to give students the chance to interact with francophones.

"Most of our parents… want their children to integrate without assimilating," he said.

Since the government's 100 per cent funding of the Jewish schools came to widespread attention with a front-page article in Le Devoir Jan. 13, it was criticized by Parti Quebecois education critic Pauline Marois. Marois, who as education minister had turned down the same request from the Jewish community, said increased state funding of religious schools is "unjustifiable" and contrary to the trend of "deconfessionalization" of the province's school system.

About five years ago, the school boards were reorganized according to language rather than Catholic and Protestant, and any teaching of religion has been made more universal.

"Through this clandestine act, without really evaluating the consequences, the [education] minister [Pierre Reid] is imposing a return to the past that no precedent justifies," she said in a statement.

Criticism has also come from the province's teachers' union, the Fédération des écoles privés du Québec, and officials and parents of other public school board representatives. Montreal's Muslim schools, however, welcomed more government funding of religious schools and would like to receive the same deal.

The heads of the two participating school boards were also less than enthusiastic about the aims of the project, although they welcomed their share of the new funding. Marguerite-Bourgeoys president Jean-Marc Crete said he believed private schools should not receive any public funding, while Pearson president Marcus Tabachnick termed the arrangement with the Jewish schools a "business deal" that will bring in a little more for the board's students.

BIALIK HEBREW DAY SCHOOL

Dr. Uri Korin to Retire from Bialik

After 19 years as Bialik Hebrew Day School's Principal/Director of Education, Dr. Uri Korin recently informed Bialik's Board of Directors of his intention to retire at the end of the 2005/06 academic year.

During his tenure Bialik experienced tremendous growth. Dr. Korin expanded the range of services to students, incorporated computer technology into its curricula and implemented many innovative programs and strategies, all of which made Bialik a leading school in the community. Under his guidance, the school grew from two unconnected buildings to the attractive, modern facility that it is today.

The Board of Directors plans to honour Dr. Korin in the spring of 2006.

The search for Dr. Korin's replacement will commence shortly.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR REQUIRED

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is a traditional conservative Synagogue with a multi-generational membership base of 1450 families. Our current Executive Director is retiring after 31 years of service to our congregation.

We are seeking a new Executive Director who will provide leadership in administering the affairs of the Synagogue. Areas of responsibility will include financial management, medium and long range planning, creating and implementing innovative membership programs, building and office operations, and fundraising.

All resumes should be sent in confidence by e-mail only to the Chairman of the Search Committee at bebysearch@yahoo.ca. Only applicants who are being considered will be contacted.

Vancouver Jewish library marks 10th anniversary

Longtime volunteer honoured

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Rita Weintraub, a longtime volunteer at the Isaac Waldman Jewish Public Library of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver – known locally as the Waldman Library – was honoured recently at the library's 10th anniversary dinner.

About 250 members of the Lower Mainland Jewish community attended the dinner, which took place last month in the JCC's Wosk Auditorium.

Weintraub was honoured for her vision and guidance in helping to arrange for the funding, establishment and growth of the Waldman Library, a 2,200-square-foot facility on the second floor of the JCC.

One of the evening's highlights was the announcement that a library endowment fund has been set up in Weintraub's name.

"Rita always wants the best of the best books in the library for the community to use and borrow," librarian Karen Corrin said. "The interest from the fund will give us the ability to purchase books that are highly recommended, or current or classic, or fill an urgent need. Rita has worked hard fundraising for the library, and this is just a token of our appreciation."

Originally from Southern Ontario, Weintraub, her husband Marvin and their three children moved to Vancouver in 1959. After retiring as an elementary school librarian in 1991, she persuaded Sophie Waldman to make a major donation in the name of her deceased husband Isaac for a new, full-fledged Jewish library in the expanded JCC.

The Waldmans were well-known philanthropists in the Lower Mainland Jewish community who helped the disadvantaged in Canada and Israel, and supported other community educational and cultural endeavours.

Starting small, the library has become a respected and well-used resource centre of Judaic books and other materials for all age groups.

When it was established in 1994, the library only had about 2,000 books. Today, it has grown to almost 16,000 volumes, and it also has thousands of videos and hundreds of music CDs, and it has started to collect DVDs.

The library's 1,500 regular users borrow between 950 and 1,200 items each month.

"Each person who walks in the door of the library has a special need and the staff and volunteers at the library aim to fill it," Corrin said.

"We're here to help, whether it's for the latest Jonathan Kellerman mystery, a video on Jews in Cuba, a picture of a scroll to use on an invitation, quotes for a speech, genealogy research or a recipe for gefilte fish. Speaking of which, the library has an amazing cookbook collection."

To promote membership, the library offers free cards to all those attending programs and classes at the JCC, as well as to students participating in speech or bookmark contests, debates, writing events and summer camps. Free cards also go out in bereavement baskets through the Jewish Family Services Agency.

The keynote speaker at the anniversary dinner was Montreal novelist and literary critic Joel Yanofsky, the author of Mordecai and Me: An Appreciation of a Kind, who spoke about the late Canadian fiction writer and essayist Mordecai Richler.

INTERFAITH BUS TOUR: Grade 8 students from the United Synagogue Day School pose in front of Cham Shan Buddhist Temple in Thornhill, one of the stops on their interfaith bus tour, held last Tuesday under the auspices of the Canadian Council of Christian and Jews. The teens visited different places of worship in order to give them an understanding of, and respect for, other faiths.

Jackson's Point Jews celebrate shul's renovation

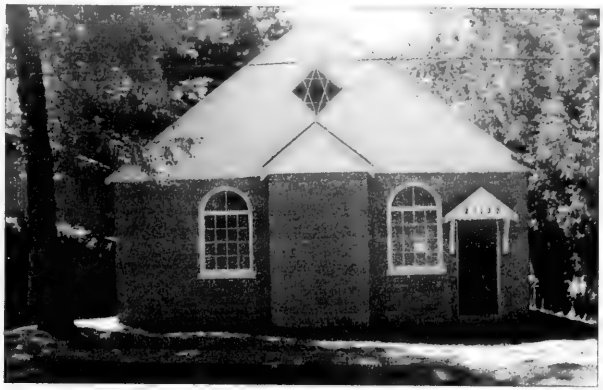
By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Jackson's Point, a resort town an hour north of Toronto known for its hotels and cottages overlooking Lake Simcoe's southern shore, can now boast of another tourist attraction.

Last summer, more than 120 Jews of various levels of observance gathered to celebrate the renovation of the 56-year old Jackson's Point Hebrew Community Centre Synagogue.

The "cottage-shul," so called because it's only open during the summer for vacationers, has come a long way since its inception in 1948.

The basic, one-story structure, which only replaced its outhouses with indoor washrooms in the mid-1980s, has now been updated to meet modern standards of comfort.



Outside of the Jackson's Point Jewish Community Centre.

"Everything was pretty dated," said Michael Harari, who sits on the shul's executive. "It definitely needed a facelift."

Sam Axelrod, also an executive member, agrees. "It was falling apart. The washrooms were disgusting, the floors were caving in, the doors were rotting."

Members finally decided that something needed to be done when it became hard to lure enough people for a minyan, partly because of the building's decrepit state and partly because many younger cottagers didn't know it existed.

After an appeal for funds, Mendel Green, Warren Kimel and Irving Wortzman – longtime cottagers in the area – made generous donations to help raise $75,000 for the shul, which has has never charged membership dues.

Changes were then made to the Ark, kitchen, lighting and washrooms, and an alarm system and air conditioning system were installed.

Since the renovations, the congregation has grown to 150 people.

Enhancements were also made to the shul's exterior, although care was taken to maintain the building's original character, Axelrod said.

"To redo the whole thing, you've lost the charm of it, the beauty of it. Plus," he added with a chuckle, "there are the financial considerations."

The shul has never had a permanent spiritual leader, but prominent Toronto rabbis who have vacationed in the area, including the late Avraham Aharon Price and the late Gedalia Felder, have offered congregants support and guidance.

Today, "the shul is under the auspices of Rabbi Yaacov Felder [Rabbi Gedalia Felder's son], who frequents the shul in the summer and answers any questions congregants may have about proper observance of Jewish customs," Harari said.

At the rededication breakfast, Green recounted fond childhood memories of the shul during its heyday, though he also recalled being subjected to signs in the area as late as the 1960s that read "No Dogs or Jews Allowed."

Harari and Axelrod hope the synagogue's best days are yet to come, as observant Jews now have an up-to-date building to go along with an enlarged Shabbat eruv, which since 2001 has encompassed the shul, nearby cottages, a local resort hotel, a popular bed and breakfast and the Georgina Inn.

"As much as [the shul] meant to the first generation, it should mean the same to the next," Harari said.

The Jewish community also sees the renovation as part of a wider movement to spruce up Jackson's Point.

"[The town] used to look tired and worn, and now it looks bright. It feels alive," Axelrod said.

Int'l conferences to focus on Jerusalem's future

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Israeli and Canadian academics will gather in Toronto and Montreal early this spring for conferences on Jerusalem's future.

The conferences, which will be largely public, are the initiative of the Jerusalem Institute of Israel Studies, an independent, nonpartisan think-tank, wholly funded by the Jerusalem Foundation, which is dedicated to promoting coexistence among the city's diverse communities.

The program is being organized by the foundation's new Canadian desk director, Steve Solomon, a Montrealer who made aliyah in August.

The first conference is to be held at the University of Toronto during the first three weeks of March, in co-operation with U of T's Munk Centre for International Studies.

A similar event will take place later in Montreal, in conjunction with McGill University and possibly the Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM), said Solomon, who recently spent two weeks in Canada.

Solomon is trying to revive the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, a fundraising arm that has existed for more than 30 years but has not been active for the past seven years. The national president is Manny Batshaw and vice-president is Yoine Goldstein, both of Montreal. Connie Putterman is the Toronto president.

Solomon said the Toronto conference, which will consist of a series of events, is expected to deal with many of the thorny issues related to Jerusalem's status within a peace settlement. The Munk Centre, whose director is Janice Stein, has among its visiting faculty a number of former Canadian diplomats in the Middle East, including Michael Malloy, Michael Bell and John Bell, Solomon pointed out.

"Canada has a long history of being an active player in the Middle East, and can contribute to the renewed search for a peace solution. Certainly, Jerusalem is the toughest issue of all to resolve," said Solomon, who, during his social work career in Montreal, was director of Miriam Home and Services and assistant director of Jewish Family Services. Before moving to Israel, he was CEO of Baltimore's Jewish Family Services for seven years.

The Jerusalem Institute is a think-tank whose input has been sought by Israeli and other decision-makers on political matters, as well as on a range of social and environmental subjects.

The Montreal conference, which is still in the planning stage but is "virtually assured," will likely involve the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (MMEP) and focus more on the social than the political, Solomon said.

He met with MMEP director, Jim Torczyner, and discussed their common interest in the problem of poverty in Jerusalem.

"The Jerusalem Institute publishes a comprehensive annual report on Israel's sociodemographics. There is a growing poverty rate in Israel, and it is especially acute in Jerusalem, which has the highest rate of children living at or below the poverty line – close to 50 per cent," Solomon said.

Jerusalem also has the lowest mean age of Israel's largest cities, explained by the high birth rate among the Arabs and the haredim, he said. The MMEP has two centres in disadvantaged neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, one in the east and one in the west.

Solomon also met with Peter Leuprecht, director of UQAM's Institut des études internationales de Montréal, with a view to involving francophone academics. David Berger, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel who is involved in the Institut and a supporter of the Jerusalem Foundation, is acting as liaison in this effort, Solomon said. The Institut, founded about two years ago, is particularly interested in Canada's foreign policy in the Middle East.

The Jerusalem Foundation has an inclusive philosophy, reflecting the vision of former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, Solomon said, and seeks the input of all of the city's citizens on such matters as education, health, social services, arts and culture and security.

Solomon said its members include Jews from all streams, Muslims and Christian Arabs.

Canadians have funded a number of major Jerusalem Foundation projects, including the Bloomfield Science Museum and the Ein Yael Living Museum, which received major support from the Desmarais family.

The Jerusalem Foundation of Canada has an office in Montreal. For information, call Jeannie Dadouche, 733-1895 or toll-free 866-733-1895. Solomon can be reached by e-mail at: steves@jerusalem-foundation.org.

Winnipeg CJA campaign closes in on goal for 04-05

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This community's annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign is rapidly closing in on its fundraising goal of $4.5 million for 2004-2005.

Elaine Goldstine, the new executive director of Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA, said that as of Jan. 6, the campaign had raised $4,365,662, or 97 per cent of the target. She said this is the ninth year in a row that CJA has raised the bar and met or exceeded the increased target.

"On a card-for-card basis, our contributions are up 5.4 per cent," she said. "Plus, our Women's Division campaign has exceeded its goal of $910,000. It now stands at $935,521."

She noted further that the CJA's New Gifts Division – its newest division, which includes younger and newer community members – has raised $99,751 to date. The goal was $100,000.

"We are raising more money every year, but the community's needs are also increasing from year to year," Goldstine said.

Goldstine was asked to become the federation's new executive director in October after her predecessor, Gerry Koffman, died of cancer the month before. She had been Koffman's longtime assistant campaign director.

Goldstine is a former president of the Winnipeg division of the National Council of Jewish Women and she was a member of the executive of the Women's Campaign before she joined Federation/CJA. (Her husband Ian Goldstine is a past federation president.)

Goldstine noted that planning for the 2005 campaign is just getting underway. Some programs are set, though, including community missions to Washington, D.C., in March to visit the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, and to Israel in May.

In June, the federation is organizing a special mission to Israel for families to be led by current federation president Neil Duboff and his wife Carol.

"The family mission may include children going to Israel to celebrate their bar and bat mitzvahs," Goldstine said. "We will probably have a third mission as usual in the fall."

Goldstine said the federation also plans to run a number of programs over the next few months to educate the community about its activities.

Montreal filmmaker survives killer tsunami

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Montrealer Harry Gulkin figures he is twice-blessed in having escaped the worst of the tsunami.

The veteran filmmaker was vacationing at a resort in southern Thailand, near the town of Krabi, when the tsunami struck.

On the morning of Dec. 26, he was sitting by himself near the beach, maybe 100 feet from the shoreline, when he suddenly realized that the water was around his feet. The wave at that point, however, did not appear to be menacing.

"Some hotel staff came down and told us to go back, that we would have to evacuate and to take our passports with us," said Gulkin, after returning to Montreal.

Gulkin ran to his room and picked up his passport, and found his wife Marie, son James and daughter-in-law Chupit, who were still in the hotel. The approximately 100 guests were told to head up the road to the hilltop of a national park behind the hotel.

Transportation was limited, and most had to walk. Gulkin, 77, hitched a ride on the back of a motorcycle. The staff spoke of a tsunami, but is was a term Gulkin knew only vaguely. There was no panic among the evacuees, he said.

Gulkin feels lucky because he had planned to stay in the Similana Resort, just 20 kilometres north of Phuket, where he had stayed twice before and which was the hardest hit area of the country. He couldn't get a room, so he ended up at the Tub Kaak Resort near Krabi, which is east of Phuket, across a bay.

"The Similana was completely wiped out and there was loss of life," he said.

What's more, Gulkin had been scheduled to take a boat ride on Dec. 26, but his son was ill and they did not go. That outing, he said, might have been deadly.

From the hilltop, little could be seen of the waves rushing in. "Some of the people had portable radios. That's how we knew what was going on."

At about 4:30 p.m., the guests were allowed to return to the hotel. "The hotel itself was not damaged, but chairs were smashed and debris had washed in to the grounds," he said.

None of the Tub Kaak's guests were injured, although a child who had been out in a boat was still missing by the time Gulkin left.

A couple of days after the tsunami, Gulkin toured the vicinity and found that just a kilometre away, other hotels were heavily damaged. "There was a commercial area where merchants had stalls that was completely lost," he added.

Gulkin said he was amazed at how calm and resilient people seemed to be in the face of disaster.

Best known for producing the 1975 movie Lies My Father Told Me, Gulkin has been to Thailand five or six times. His son has lived in the country for about 25 years and today runs a major seafood exporting company.

Gulkin and his family went to Bangkok, where his son lives, on Jan. 1 and returned to Montreal Jan. 9.

Gulkin said he won't hesitate to return to Thailand. "It's a beautiful country with lovely people."

Synagogue holds service for victims of the disaster

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL –Even though Israel and Indonesia have never enjoyed diplomatic relations, an official from the Indonesian embassy came to a Montreal synagogue recently to express sympathy for tsunami victims and heartfelt gratitude to the Jewish community for responding in large numbers and in a timely manner to the tragedy that hit her country the hardest.

Gardina Karatasasmita, an official of the Department of Foreign Affairs at the Indonesian embassy, was joined by other representatives from Southeast Asian diplomatic missions and communities at a special 45-minute tsunami service on Shabbat, Jan. 8, hosted by the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue.

The Canadian government designated that date as a national day of mourning for the tsunami victims.

Of the approximately 150,000 from 11 countries estimated so far to have died from the Dec. 26 tsunami, two-thirds have been Indonesian.

Sri Lanka – at 30,000 — has suffered the second highest death toll.

"It was incredible to see," Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, the synagogue's spiritual leader, told The CJN. "To think that she [Karatasasmita] spoke this way even though there's never been diplomatic contact between Israel and Indonesia, was incredible."

Rabbi Steinmetz said his synagogue decided to "extend its hand" as a gesture of solidarity and as part of the "religious obligation" Jews have to help any Jew or non-Jew in need. He asked Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) for support in organizing the service.

"We approach this terrible disaster in the context of Jewish tradition, a tradition that demands that we be our neighbour's keeper, that we take responsibility for the entire world," Rabbi Steinmetz told the congregation.

"This is… the Jewish tradition of tikkun olam, of fixing the world."

Jews, he said, possess a "special sensitivity to the suffering of others.

"We Jews know what is it to suffer, to be homeless, to have families wiped out. We learn sensitivity from our history. And so we have to be more sensitive to the hundreds of thousands of other people suffering today from this terrible catastrophe.

"Fundamentally, we have to recognize in this the humanity that unites all of us."

Irwin Cotler, MP for Mount Royal, who said he was honoured to participate in the service, described several of his government's initiatives in response to the crisis and indicated Canadian relief and aid would be long term, "long after the glare of the cameras and the headlines have passed.

"It is said, 'We are all one human family and are each other's guardians.' Today is a manifestation of this."

Among those delivering remarks at the service were Alain Bonneau, honorary consul of Sri Lanka; Sanat Kaul and Aras Martono, respectively Indian and Indonesian representatives at the International Civil Aviation Organization; Israeli Consul General Marc Attali, and Ramani Balendra, president of the Canadian Tamil Congress' Quebec chapter.

Those in attendance also included Bashir Hussein and Edward Wolkove, co-presidents of Muslim-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal; Laya Alles of the Sri Lanka Canada Association of Montreal; Penny Balendra, president of the Quebec Coalition for Peace in Sri Lanka, and Jeffrey Boro, president of CJC-Q.

Federations involved in relief effort

Rebecca Soberman of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said the organization has raised $800,000 in cash, mainly online or through cheques, as well as $600,000 in direct donations of medical supplies from Walter Arbib, the CEO of Skylink.

"We thought that interest would die down after the first few days, but it hasn't," Soberman said, adding that donations are still coming in.

"It's a testament to the Toronto Jewish community. We're humbled and impressed with the way the community has responded."

Federations across the country are also involved with the relief effort.

In Winnipeg, for instance, Elaine Goldstine, executive director of Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal, said Winnipeg Jews have raised more than $35,000, and Federation/CJA is sending the money to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which is co-ordinating the North American Jewish community's response to the disaster.

In Calgary, the Calgary Jewish Community Council has raised close to $10,000.

Other Canadian federations raising funds include the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, FEDERATION CJA in Montreal, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the London Jewish Federation.

None are charging administration fees, so all the money raised is going to tsunami relief, and the aid is being distributed on a non-sectarian basis.

Last week, the JDC sent relief supplies to hard-hit Aceh province in Indonesia. It also dispatched clothing, food and temporary shelter to India, to be distributed through local partner agencies, and it sent clothes, food and medical help to Chabad of Thailand.

The organization has also sent representatives to Sri Lanka to determine what and where help is needed, and to select an aid agency on the ground to help.

An ad-hoc group of some 44 Jewish groups across North America – the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief – has also been formed to plan a unified and effective long-term response to the tragedy.

At press time, an estimated $10 million had been raised from the North American Jewish community.

Abbas' intentions are far from clear

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As expected, the media gave considerable attention to presidential elections in the Palestinian Authority. While most commended the fact free elections took place, editorial commentary on Jan. 11 was basically split between doubts that president-elect Mahmoud Abbas would be able to deliver on genuine peace and skepticism that Israel would be sufficiently forthcoming in meeting the Palestinians' demands.

The sides were by no means equally divided. More editorials expressed doubts about the Palestinian possibilities, although a few tried to steer a middle course, outlining expectations from both sides.

The Vancouver Sun editorial, "Now it's up to Abbas to deliver," said that if "the Palestinians are to form their own state and live in peace alongside their neighbour [Israel]," Abbas must take the necessary steps to stop attacks on Israelis, including dismantling the terrorist infrastructure. As well, the Sun said, he must also stop insisting that the Palestinians have a "right of return" to Israel.

In "Many Challenges await Abbas," Montreal's Gazette wrote that Abbas "will have to work out a modus vivendi with the terror groups." However, the Gazette ignored the essential precondition spelled out in the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan: an end to Palestinian violence and terrorism against Israelis and the dismantling of the terrorist groups.

The Edmonton Journal expressed caution: "The fact that the parties feel a need to appear more constructive today doesn't mean they're one whit closer to contemplating the sort of risky compromises the other side might conceivably accept for a general peace… Still… it is encouraging to hear radical Palestinian leaders acknowledge Abbas' victory and tentatively accept him."

Indeed, "tentatively" is the operative word. There can be no real long-term compromise with groups that are ideologically dedicated to the destruction of Israel. Short-term, band-aid solutions only disguise the deep fissures just beneath the surface of intra-Palestinian relations.

While the Toronto Star's Jan. 6 editorial "Glimmer of hope for Mideast peace" criticized Abbas for his anti-Israel election rhetoric, its Jan. 11 editorial placed more expectations on Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – and on U.S. president George W. Bush – than on the PA president-elect.

The Star faulted Sharon for showing no inclination to give up occupied areas beyond Gaza and said that "without strong, sustained support from the White House, Abbas cannot hope to face down Hamas and Hezbollah." However, this begs the question of whether Abbas has any intention of following this course.

The Star also insisted that "absent pressure from the White House, Sharon has no incentive to compromise." This ignores the bold steps that Sharon took prior to the elections, including foremost declaring his intention to withdraw from Gaza.

The Globe and Mail sounded a warning note in its Jan. 11 editorial "Don't overestimate Abbas' prospects," saying that "it is best to be skeptical about [Abbas'] capacity to make peace with Israel."

The Globe recognized that while Abbas won a substantial majority of the vote, his victory was mainly due to the backing of the Fatah party machine and not his personal popularity. Given the hurdles Abbas faces, especially from rejectionist factions such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad (and even groups within the PLO), the Globe thinks undue optimism is out of place.

Unlike the late PA president Yasser Arafat, Abbas has long been considered a pragmatist and a moderate. He has maintained that violence hurts rather than advances Palestinian national interests and that there is no substitute for negotiations. However, during Abbas' election campaign, he insisted that he would not confront the militants. Some analysts said that this was election bluster designed to solidify his popular support and give him more clout in eventually dealing with the rejectionists. Then there's the lingering doubt about Abbas' avowed commitment to maintaining Arafat's legacy, in particular his support for the "right of return."

All told, we don't know where Abbas is actually headed.

Raichel kicks off Hillel's Israeli festival

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

In an attempt to kick off the week-long Israeli Cultural Festival with a bang, Hillel has teamed up with one of the hottest musicians out of Israel.

Idan Raichel, of the Idan Raichel Project, whose music is a marriage of Ethiopian and Israeli influences, performs at Hillel's annual fundraiser at the Danforth Music Hall in Toronto on Jan. 27, which begins his North American tour.

The group hopes that enough money will be raised to finance university student programs.

Although Raichel's second album was recently released, both he and Moshik Galanty, Hillel's Israeli arts and culture co-ordinator, are still reeling from the success of Raichel's first project.

"[Raichel] couldn't believe how successful [his debut album] became. It was on top of the charts for a year in Israel. It was a phenomenon no one expected," Galanty said.

The Israeli Cultural Festival takes place across campuses in the Greater Toronto Area, including the University of Toronto, York University and Ryerson University, from Jan. 28 to Feb. 5.

Entertainment is not the only thing on the minds of those who worked to put this event together. Galanty hopes it will provide an opportunity for different cultures, races and communities to come together to embrace what Israel has to offer.

He is working with the Israeli consulate to bring Toronto's Ethiopian community into the festivities, and to enjoy music that features Ethiopian instruments, musicians and songs in Amharic.

Idan Raichel

"It's a week that celebrates Israel in a way that's not about conflict, but culture," Galanty said.

Events include a sports day, with a city-wide men's basketball ball tournament, a Shabbat dinner, a film screening at the Bloor Cinema and a shuk day on which an Israeli market will be recreated.

"Maybe when people see the developments in Israel, they'll have a different conception of what Israel is and Judaism is, and that's the main concept of the festival," Galanty said.

Tu b'Shvat, a time to rejoice over the fruits of Israel

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The 15th day of the month of Shvat marks the beginning of the new year for trees and rejoicing over the fruits of the land of Israel. On Tu b'Shvat, it is the custom to eat a new fruit, one that you've not eaten in the past year, especially to eat fruits from the seven species for which the land of Israel is praised.

Bokser, pomegranates, pears, citrons, oranges, apples, dates, nuts, melons, apricots, plums, grapes – both fresh and dried – are the traditional fruits eaten on Tu b'Shvat. Although this is considered a minor festival, in Israel, the children are encouraged to plant trees, homes are decorated with flowers and fruits and many have a Tu b'Shvat seder.

TU B'SHVAT FRUITED CHICKEN

1 large onion
1 tbsp. oil
1 chicken, quartered
¼ tsp. ginger
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup apricot jam
1 cup orange juice
juice of one lemon
2 cups chicken broth or water
1 cup prunes, pitted
1 cup dried apricots
1 cup roasted, unsalted almonds (½ cup chopped coarsely, ½ cup left whole) salt and pepper to taste

Chop the onion. Sauté in large pot with oil until soft, but not browned.

While onion is cooking, mix ginger and cinnamon and sprinkle on chicken pieces. When onion is finished, place chicken in the pot, and brown on all sides. Add all other ingredients, reserving ½ cup whole almonds for garnish. Cook over low flame for at least 40 minutes, adding more broth if necessary. Add salt and pepper. Serve with rice and garnish with remaining almonds. Makes 4 servings.

TURKEY WITH FRUIT AND NUT STUFFING

You can also make this dish using a large roasting chicken and ground chicken.

1 turkey, about 9 pounds salt and pepper
margarine or oil for roasting
12 oz. ground turkey meat
4 oz. chopped onion
4 oz.white raisins
5 oz. chopped, pitted, dried dates
5 oz. chopped, pitted prunes
5 oz. chopped dried apricots
5 oz. chopped dried figs
2 oz. whole almonds
4 oz. brandy or wine

Fry the ground turkey meat gently with the chopped onions; drain off the fat. Stir in the dried fruits, nuts, salt and pepper to taste, and the brandy or wine. Mix it well and use it to stuff the washed and dried turkey.

Truss the turkey, rub with margarine or oil and roast the way you normally do a turkey, allowing 20 minutes per pound of bird. Have the oven at 425 when you first put the bird in; immediately turn the oven down to 325 and leave it at that temperature for the duration of roasting. Makes 8 servings.

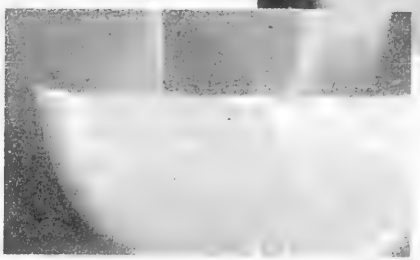
GLAZED APRICOTS

½ cup honey
½ cup sugar
20 jumbo moist dried apricots

Combine the water, honey and sugar in a heavy, large saucepan over medium heat and cook until the sugar dissolves. Add the apricots and cook until apricots are tender and syrup is reduced and thinly coats spoon, stirring frequently, about 20 minutes. Cool apricots in syrup for at least 2 hours. Remove the apricots from the syrup (apricots will be sticky). Drain them on paper towels to remove any excess syrup. This recipe can be doubled or tripled. Makes 20.

ISRAELI SPICED FRUIT

1½ cups each, dried figs, pitted prunes, dried apricots, nectarines or pears
¾ cup golden raisins
1 lemon, thinly sliced, cut into half circles
2 cinnamon sticks
⅓ cup sugar
½ cup sliced almonds
⅓ cup lemon juice



Place figs (stems removed) in saucepan and cover with warm water. Soak for one hour, then drain. Add enough water to cover figs by 3 inches. Place over medium heat and simmer until just soft, 5 to 10 minutes. Add prunes, apricots, raisins, lemon, cinnamon sticks and sugar. Simmer over low heat, stirring gently, until sugar dissolves, about 5 minutes. Remove from heat; add almonds, lemon juice and enough water to cover by 3 inches. Refrigerate covered for several days to allow the fruits to absorb the liquid and blend the flavours. Serve either chilled, at room temperature or warmed. Makes 8 servings.

ANDREA'S SPICE CAKE

My cousin Andrea used to bake this cake for a very popular restaurant in Atlanta. One taste and you'll be hooked. I've also made it substituting apricots for the prunes.

1 cup oil
1½ cups sugar
3 eggs
2 cups self-rising flour
½ tsp. salt
1 tsp. cloves
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. allspice
1 cup orange juice

Sauce:
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. margarine
1 tsp. vanilla
½ cup orange juice
½ tsp. baking soda

Boil prunes in a small amount of water for about 3 minutes to plump and set aside. (If prunes are plump and moist, omit this step.) In the large bowl of an electric mixer, beat oil, sugar and eggs for 2 minutes. Sift dry ingredients together in a separate bowl. While beating egg mixture on low speed, alternate adding flour mixture and orange juice. Beat only enough to blend, about 3 minutes.

Pour into a 9 x 13-inch pan and place prunes on top. Bake 45 minutes at 350.

Mix sauce ingredients together in a heavy saucepan and stir until it comes to a boil. Boil for 2 minutes. When cake comes out of the oven, prick holes in it and pour the sauce over the hot cake. Syrup will be absorbed into the cake. Makes 16 servings.

Baycrest launches a charitable gift annuity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has launched a philanthropic investment project.

The Baycrest Charitable Gift Annuity will provide individuals with a guaranteed income for life. The annuity also includes a gift component for the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

Florence Weinberger, Baycrest's director of development, says that the annuity is "a charitable gift and an annuity contract, which will pay a guaranteed and fixed amount of income for the rest of your life."

This annuity, she says, is ideally suited for individuals aged 65 or older who rely on investment income traditionally earned through fixed income securities.

"Payments, for the most part, are tax-free. The rate of return is extremely attractive, easily outperforming GICs and Canada Savings Bonds."

With a one-time payment of any amount of $7,500 or more, one-quarter of the payment is a tax deductible donation to the Baycrest Centre Foundation, which benefits Baycrest's Brain Health Centre Clinics. The remaining 75 per cent will purchase an annuity through Desjardins Financial Security.

The Baycrest Charitable Gift Annuity

From the brochure on the Charitable Gift Annuity

Annuity payments have a guaranteed minimum of an eight-year payout from the date of contract. "If the annuitant dies before the eight-year period ends, payments will continue to be made to a designated beneficiary to the end of the guaranteed term," Weinberger says.

"Everyone wins with the Baycrest Charitable Gift Annuity, and you pay less tax on your investment income."

One 80-year-old man, who chose to remain anonymous, says he is in the process of winding down his business and recently purchased a Baycrest annuity.

He told The CJN that when his sister was in Baycrest some 20 years ago, he promised that he would leave something to the centre.

When he signs up for a Baycrest annuity, he will get a tax receipt for one-quarter of his payment. He will receive payments for the rest of his life at a favourable interest rate, and pay considerably less tax.

He joked that at 80, he had just bought himself a new set of golf clubs and with luck, would live another 15 or 20 years, adding, more seriously, that if he does not survive for eight years, his estate will receive the payments for the designated period. "The annuity works out to my advantage."

On payment of $50,000, he will receive a tax receipt for $12,500, and the balance will be invested. He will receive monthly payments of $373.51. Should he die, his payments will be guaranteed to 2013.

"I will receive $4,482.12 each year for the rest of my life and most of it is tax free. This is a rate of almost nine per cent," he says.

Howard Mammon, senior development officer at the Baycrest Centre Foundation says that "the Baycrest Charitable Gift Annuity is secure and it's worry-free. There is no portfolio to follow or stock market to watch – and payments are fixed and will likely increase your after-tax income."

The program can be customized, he adds. For example, an annuity can be purchased jointly so that payments continue until both annuitants have died.

Hamas' military actions have political goals

Analysis

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The tug of war between Hamas and the Palestinian Authority under Mahmoud Abbas has destroyed a pre-election agreement with regard to violence that they reached prior to the elections for the PA presidency.

The agreement was based on Hamas' strategy that a new PA president had to be elected to determine who the Hamas opponent would be in coming political campaigns, during both the disengagement and the PA parliamentary elections in six months' time. Abbas therefore benefited from the "positive abstention" of Hamas supporters during his recent election.

Hamas' plans are based on the assumption that Abbas will avoid violent confrontation with them and the other opposition groups in the PA. They therefore feel free to operate against Israeli targets, to gain political points in the Palestinian street. Their goal is to position disengagement as a clear victory for Hamas and its strategy of armed struggle.

To achieve this, Hamas needs to eliminate Abbas' ability to negotiate the conditions of a disengagement with Israel. In implementing this policy, Hamas depends on knee-jerk responses from the Israel Defence Forces and the cabinet. Hamas hopes that Israel's cutting off communication with Abbas, IDF operations in the Gaza Strip, continued Qassam and mortar attacks and, no less important, Israel's placing responsibility for attacks at Abbas' doorstep, will let Hamas dictate conditions.

However, Hamas also faces a dilemma. Arafat manoeuvered between PA factions and Hamas, but Abbas is less predictable. He might even boycott Hamas entirely. Even if this does not lead to violence between the factions, it could deny Hamas the ability to use terrorist attacks as political blackmail.

Abbas hints at such an option in his frequent pronouncements against terror attacks. Hamas responds with hints of its own that it is ready to reach a deal.

By hinting at conditions for talks, such as the freeing of prisoners, Hamas believes it can avoid cutting its ties with the PA.

The position of the Hamas and Islamic Jihad leadership outside the Gaza Strip in this dispute is entirely unclear, as is their ability to dictate moves in the Strip. Publicly, they are committed to a continuation of the armed struggle, but they must also consider the position of Syria, which has come under fire from the United States and Europe for hosting their organizations.

Continued Hamas attacks in Gaza attest to a struggle between the domestic and foreign branches of the organization, as was also the case within the PLO in the past.

Abbas orders security forces to prevent attacks on Israelis

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas ordered security forces on Monday to prevent Palestinian attacks on Israelis, a PA cabinet minister said.

"[Abbas] and the cabinet gave clear instructions to the security chiefs to prevent all kinds of violence, including attacks against Israel," minister without portfolio Qadoura Fares told Reuters.

"There are intensified instructions to the Palestinian security forces to assume their responsibilities," Communications Minister Azzam al-Ahmed told reporters after Monday's cabinet meeting. Asked whether this included trying to prevent attacks, he said: "For sure."

"We have a decision to stop the cycle of violence," al-Ahmed said.

"The attacks by the Palestinian side must come to an end, but Israeli military operations must also end," he said.

But the radical Islamic movement Hamas was swift to announce it would continue with its attacks against Israeli targets, Israel Radio reported.

Earlier Monday, Israel's Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim said that Israeli officials were weighing the future use of artillery in response to Palestinian attacks.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said repeatedly that no limitations have been placed on the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), but in practice he has send troops into the Strip largely for "measured responses" to the attacks.

"From the diplomatic standpoint, there is still the desire to grant a certain, if limited, window of time so that [Abbas] can get organized," Boim said.

"The time window is very limited," Boim said, referring to Abbas. "Certainly, there will be no 100 days of grace."

Palestinians gunners fired four Qassams into the Negev and a northern Gaza settlement on Monday morning, Israel Radio reported. There were no injuries.

Sharon told his cabinet on Sunday that IDF commanders had been given orders to operate "without restrictions, I repeat, without restrictions" against militant Qassam and mortar crews in the Gaza Strip.

"What is clear is that the IDF will have the authority to take all necessary measures in line with the prime minister's comments at the cabinet meeting yesterday," Prime Minister's Office official David Baker told Ha'aretz on Monday.

"The prime minister's comments underline his determination to protect Israeli citizens in the face of total inaction by the Palestinian Authority in all that concerns prevention of terrorist attacks."

On Saturday, when a teenage girl was critically wounded in a rocket attack on Sderot and two days after six people were killed in the Karni attack, political and military officials threatened to begin a major IDF operation in Gaza. But the atmosphere changed Sunday, when various officials, including Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, asked Sharon to give Abbas some time to deal with the terror organizations.

Nonetheless, Boim said Monday, if the attacks continued, "radical solutions" could be employed against them.

"There are officials and very serious people who say that you must meet a steep trajectory with a steep trajectory, to mark out an artillery battery, make an advance announcement to the residents, and move artillery up to certain neighborhoods, and then people will understand," Boim told Israel Radio.

"We will not conduct the war like the Americans did in Falluja, for example… But if we warn the population of what may happen, maybe they will understand this language."

Military sources said Sunday that the IDF was preparing for a "measured response" in Gaza. The army intends to carry out a series of local, targeted operations in areas from where the terror groups have launched rockets. The IDF is likely to send relatively small units for a short time. So far a fairly small number of additional troops has been sent to Gaza.

In contrast to its actions after previous instances of rocket attacks resulting in casualties, the IDF has not yet raided the Beit Hanun area in northern Gaza, from where rockets were most recently fired at Sderot.

'Iranian threat growing'

By GIDEON ALON

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Iran's Shihab 4 missile, which is currently under development, could become a significant threat to Israel and U.S. troops in Iraq, according to Uzi Rubin, a missile technology expert who addressed the Knesset's foreign affairs committee last week.

Rubin and Yair Ramati, of Israel Aircraft Industries, said Iran has the most advanced missile technology in the region, with 30 years experience and enormous investments over the past decade in liquid and solid fuel technologies, guidance systems, and scientific and engineering manpower.

They said Israel has observed consistent progress in missile development in Iran, which aims to achieve complete independence and no need for further expert foreign assistance. They said Iran has denied it's developing a missile with a range of 4,000 kilometres that could reach as far as Britain.

The experts outlined a regional map of missile technology, noting that Hezbollah has missiles with ranges between 40 and 70 kilometres; Iran is developing a new short-range (250 kilometres) missile; and Iran and Syria have old Scud B missiles with ranges of 300 to 500 kilometres.

Iran's Shihab 3 has a range of 1,500 kilometres.

You open the newspaper and every single story relates to you. The street names are the names of our forefathers. The places you go are all part of your heritage. It's made for you. That's the reality."

Oziel, his wife Nina, and their six children – Avi, 23, Yehuda, 17, Dalia, 9, Eli, 8, Yossi, 7, and Deena, 5 – were among 2,860 North American Jews who moved to Israel in 2004, a record high since 1983. And by the time their El Al charter flight landed at Tel Aviv's Ben Gurion Airport on Dec. 29, their new status as citizens was official. The Oziels joined 183 passengers from the United States and about a dozen fellow Canadians. They received assistance from Nefesh B'Nefesh (Soul with Soul), a private organization that helps new immigrants in conjunction with the Jewish Agency.

Nefesh B'Nefesh (NBN) has assisted 5,000 immigrants since its launch in the summer of 2002. By providing assistance of various forms, NBN aims to ease the transition of moving. It helps cut the red tape of obtaining Israeli citizenship and provides assistance with finding schools, Hebrew language intensives, obtaining professional licences and organizing many other details of setting up life in a new country. With ongoing workshops and gatherings, it also offers immigrants the opportunity to network with other English speakers.

The method seems to be working. Of the 1,520 Nefesh B'Nefesh newcomers who arrived in 2002-03, 93 per cent of families have at least one employed spouse, 99 per cent remain in Israel, 55 children have been born and 11 newcomers have married.

Nefesh B'Nefesh receives most of its funding from private Jewish donors. In addition to financial grants of several thousand dollars from NBN that vary in size depending on needs and assets, immigrants are also eligible for a "sal klita" from the Israeli government. This "absorption basket" includes tax breaks, favourable mortgage rates, grants for university study for young arrivals, Hebrew-language intensive study programs and other benefits.

"The more people know what we're doing, the better it is going to be for the Jewish people," said Nefesh co-founder Tony Gelbart, president and CEO of CPM Worldwide Group, a Florida-based investment company with holdings in Israel and the U.S.

Newcomers are greatly valued

On the Dec. 29 landing, immigrants came from all walks of life. The youngest was Yocheved Chaya Goldman at 10½ weeks, who moved to Jerusalem from Flushing, N.Y., with her parents, Esther and Shaul Goldman. The oldest was Irme Haas, 97, a survivor of Bergen-Belson from Englewood, N.J., who moved together with her sister, Hilde Meyer, 94. Each twice widowed and childless, they are now sharing a room in a Jerusalem senior citizen's residence called Beit Barth. Another set of sisters, Rachel and Jackie Siegel, 21 and 19, respectively, arrived from Denver, Colo. They were among some 100 singles on the flight, many of them graduates of the Birthright Israel program.

Toronto research physician Josh Kruger, 33, officially made aliyah this past summer but flew from North America to accompany his physician wife, Tamara, 30, and their sons, Adin, 3, and Ariel, 4. They are now living in Modiin. "We have been and are still very proud Canadians," Kruger said mid-flight. "We see the Jewish homeland going through a hard time and so we are becoming Israeli citizens with the hope that we'll be able to contribute to Israeli society. Like any parent, I have my concerns, but I'm more worried about the security of Israel… The best thing we can do as Jews is to make a contribution to the Jewish homeland."

Other Canadians on the flight included Tara Bredin, 28, of Richmond Hill; Brenda Caplan, of Montreal; Samuel Elliott, 40, of London, Ont.; Yakov Frydman-Kohl, 21, of Toronto; Chaim Gamliel, 24, of Toronto; Noah Joseph, 24, of Montreal; Joshua Phillipson, 30, of Toronto, and Erik Schwartzfeld, 29, of Vancouver.

An aspiring translator, Schwartzfeld plans to move to an absorption centre in Kfar Saba. "I've been strongly affected by the political situation here and felt that by being here I can make a difference. I also have a strong interest in the Hebrew language and find it a joy to learn. But the strongest determinant would have to be the vibe, the feeling that life here is both more meaningful and more culturally interesting than my life in Canada."

As the plane landed, Israel clearly intended to send a message that the newcomers are greatly valued. They were welcomed by flag-waving soldiers in white uniforms and khaki fatigues, the official army band of the Israel Defence Forces, the sound of shofar blasts and a swarm of photographers capturing images of immigrants kneeling to kiss the ground.

After official remarks at a welcome ceremony in an empty airplane hangar, the army band played the traditional klezmer and Israeli songs that accompany Jewish wedding and bar mitzvah celebrations. The crowd of immigrants, and the many relatives and friends who came to greet them at the airport, broke into spirited circle dances and song. The parents of Isaac Oziel's wife, Nina, renowned artist Jan Moses and his wife Rachel, who made aliyah to Har Nof 15 years ago and operate a gallery in Tsfat, celebrated the arrival of their daughter and her family.

For Oziel, the sense of belonging is immense. "In Canada, I went to high level, executive positions and felt my kippah hindered my ability to get a job," Oziel said. "In Israel, you're accepted. If you wear a kippah, it's not part of the equation. It's based on your experience and who you are."

And who the Oziels are, and who they are becoming with each passing day in Israel, represents the fulfilment of a family legacy, 50 years in the making.

HOLOCAUST-ERA SWISS BANK CLAIMS

A new list is now available of Swiss bank account holders who were probably or possibly victims of Nazi persecution. The list, resulting from further negotiations with Swiss banks, is part of the claims process under the Settlement of the Holocaust Victim Assets class action litigation in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Chief Judge Edward R. Korman presiding. To date, the Court has authorized repayment of more than $220 million from the Settlement Fund to bank account owners or their heirs.

The new list of Swiss bank account holders is on the website of the Claims Resolution Tribunal,www.crt-ii.org. Applications are also available on this website. Please call the telephone number below if you are unable to view this new list of bank account holders.

* Individuals who believe that they are owners, or heirs of owners, of the accounts included in the new list must file an application.
* Applications may only be submitted for the accounts appearing on the new list.
* If you previously filed an application with the Claims Resolution Tribunal for another account and you now want to claim an account on the new list, you must submit a new application.
* There is no fee or other charge for filing and processing claims.
* Deadline for filing new applications: July 13, 2005.

A list of organizations that will assist individuals with the applications is included with the claim forms and is available at www.crt-ii.org.

Please check the website of the Claims Resolution Tribunal,www.crt-ii.org, periodically for updates regarding the Settlement.

Also published on the website www.crt-ii.org is a new list of 36 names of Holocaust Era insurance policyholders who had policies issued by the Austrian insurer Der Anker which, because of special circumstances, are covered by the Settlement. Insurance claims forms may also be downloaded from this website.

Terrorists kill six

Six Israelis were killed and four wounded in an attack by Palestinian terrorists at the Karni crossing point in the Gaza Strip last Thursday.

A vote for peace?

A Ramallah pollster said that popular support for newly elected Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas does not necessarily reflect Palestinian support for ending the intifada. The 62 per cent support for Abbas, Prof. Khalil Shikaki said, does not mean that 62 per cent of Palestinians support ending violence against Israel. "The public continues to be split in its attitude toward violence," Shikaki said.

Russia denies missile deal

Russia denied reports it plans to sell Syria missiles that could threaten Israel. "We do not have any negotiations with Syria on the possible shipment of such missiles," Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov was quoted as saying in response to reports Damascus had placed an order with Moscow for shoulder- launched SA-18 missiles and ground-to-ground Iskander-E missiles.

Israel sends tsunami relief

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Israel's humanitarian response to the Southeast Asian tsunami – from both the government and civilians – was immediate and has continued since the Dec. 26 disaster.

On Dec. 28, following a request of the Sri Lankan government, Israel sent more than 82 tons of medicine, water, food, blankets and generators, along with a delegation of some 50 medical and rescue personnel. The aid and medical equipment included 10,000 blankets, 3,680 litres of mineral water, 12 tons of food and more than nine tons of medicine, as well as generators, tents, beds and mattresses.

Last week, an El Al plane flew to Sri Lanka and Indonesia with an additional 85 tons of material donated by Israeli organizations and companies.

The plane landed Monday in Colombo, Sri Lanka, with equipment for emergency food kitchens donated by Israel's National Council for Voluntarism, Koach Latet, as well as by the United Kibbutz Movement. The kitchens were to provide hot meals for some 4,000 people a day. In addition, these organizations and Magen David Adom contributed medical equipment to set up a mobile health clinic. Five kitchen workers and nine medical personnel arrived on separate flights. Another medical delegation specializing in trauma arrived the same day, funded by the Israeli Health and Foreign ministries.

From Colombo, the plane continued to Indonesia with 75 tons of emergency materials. The cargo included 16 tons of baby food donated by Remedia and Materna; 30 tons of rice, flour, water, sugar and grains donated by Koach Latet and Israeli food manufacturers Sugat and Osem; five tons of plastic sheeting donated by Hovav Plastica and Haogenplast; and 20 tons of medicines from Teva Pharmaceuticals, donated through Koach Latet. In addition, donations from Shari Arison Glazer and the Shira Hadasha congregation in Jerusalem funded a water purification system produced by Israeli manufacturer Netafim, which itself donated a second system.

Ron Prosor, director general of Israel's ministry of foreign affairs, was received in Indonesia by senior officials, who expressed appreciation for the Israeli aid, the first of its kind. Prosor conveyed condolences from Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom to his Indonesian counterpart, and they discussed continued mid- and long-term Israeli aid.

"This is the largest Muslim country in the world,with which we do not have diplomatic relations," Prosor said. "I feel that they received our aid as it was given, from heart to heart, Jews helping Muslims in time of distress."

Survivors and perpetrators interviewed for history of Auschwitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Jan. 27, world leaders – from the presidents of Germany and Israel to the prime minister of France and the U.S. secretary of state – will gather in the Polish town of Oswiecim to mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of a singularly evil place, the Auschwitz death camp.

Auschwitz, which consumed the lives of approximately one million Jewish civilians, 70,000 Polish political prisoners, 20,000 Gypsies, 10,000 Soviet prisoners of war and hundreds of Jehovah Witnesses, was the greatest industrialized extermination centre to blight the conscience of civilization.

When the Red Army, spearheaded by the First Ukrainian Front, entered this dark alternative universe on that bleak winter day six decades ago, nearly 8,000 ragged, starving, diseased survivors were on hand to greet their Slavic liberators.

Since then, survivors and historians alike have churned out a torrent of first-hand memoirs and accounts of that monstrous camp and epitaph to man's inhumanity to man. The latest, Auschwitz: A New History (HarperCollins), is written by Laurence Rees, the creative director of history programs for the BBC and the author of five books about Nazi Germany and World War II. Its publication coincides with the launch of Rees' six-hour television series, Auschwitz: Inside the Nazi State, on PBS.

A thorough researcher and fluid writer, Rees produces no startling, earth-shaking revelations in this engaging volume. The facts about this revolting killing factory in southern Poland, after all, are more or less known. But mindful that context is everything, Rees places the camp within the perspective of the Holocaust, examines certain issues that generally have been underplayed and offers insights from survivors and perpetrators based on some 100 original interviews.

As he reminds us, Auschwitz was not really conceived as a site to kill Jews, but rather as a quarantine concentration camp to hold prisoners before they were shipped off to other camps. But in time, Auschwitz, with its 28 sub-camps ranging from Birkenau to Monowitz, morphed into the biggest death camp in German-occupied Europe.

Despite their murderous intentions toward Jews, the Nazis originally thought of solving the "Jewish question" through the medium of forced emigration. Heinrich Himmler, the mild-looking chicken farmer turned SS chieftain, hoped that a swift victory in the war would enable Germany to resettle Jews in the tropics.

But as the war dragged on, enmeshing the vaunted German army in a morass in the Soviet Union, the Nazis revised their plans and started thinking of genocide. In the summer of 1941, Himmler told a subordinate that Hitler had ordered the "Final Solution" and had selected Auschwitz, among other sites, for this unprecedented task.

Extermination, of course had already been raised by such Nazi ideologues as Joseph Goebbels, the propaganda minister, and Hans Frank, the governor of occupied Poland, as an alternative to emigration.

The first batch of prisoners to arrive at Auschwitz, in June 1940, were 30 German criminals transferred from the Sachsenhausen camp in Germany. They were followed by Poles who had resisted the Nazis, Germans consigned to euthanasia and captured Soviet soldiers. In their wake came Dutch and French Jews – including thousands of children, such as Odette Daltroff-Baticle, who was interviewed by Rees and who had been brutally separated from her parents – and Jews from all corners of Europe, even the Channel Islands.

Of approximately 2.7 million Jews who were murdered at the peak of the Holocaust in 1942, 200,000 were killed in Auschwitz. But Auschwitz's fiendish capacity to consume Jews reached its apogee in 1944 with the slaughter of some 400,000 Hungarian Jews.

Virtually all of them perished in Birkenau, three kilometres away from Auschwitz itself. Birkenau had prepared itself for such an eventuality. In March 1943, just a few weeks before the Warsaw ghetto uprising, the first crematorium/gas chamber was installed in Birkenau. By the summer, three more units were added. These crematoria could dispose of 4,400 people a day. The figures boggle the mind.

Rees points out that one of the reasons the Nazis turned to crematoria was that less efficient methods – mass shootings and primitive gas vans – apparently caused psychological problems for the killers. And in the interests of maintaining total control over their unsuspecting victims, the Nazis eventually learned not to separate children from their mothers, he adds.

The fanatic SS guards who funnelled Jews toward the gas chambers were convinced they were performing a sacred duty. Oskar Groening, who was 21 when he was posted to Auschwitz, told Rees he was not bothered by the murder of children. "The children are not the enemy at the moment," he explained. "The enemy is the blood in them. The enemy is their growing up to become a Jew who could be dangerous." Nazi race theories had obviously taken root in him.

Groening, whose job was to sort luggage, was a minor figure in the larger scheme of things. Far more important were the Nazi doctors who played a key role in the vital selection process and conducted medical experiments. The doctors created a sense that the killings were not merely arbitrary acts of prejudice, but of scientific importance.

Rudolf Höss, the commandant of Auschwitz, set the moral tone. Asked after the war whether he had ever considered the possibility of disobeying an order to kill Jews, he replied that it had never even occurred to him. "I naturally had to obey orders," he said.

Although the Nazis fatuously claimed they were upright men of honour carrying out a holy mission in Auschwitz, they were, needless to say, common criminals.

The SS was massively implicated in the theft of prisoners' belongings in the Canada warehouse. Nazi theory trumpeted the "purity of blood" and decreed that physical contact with Jewish women was absolutely forbidden. Yet members of the SS willingly ignored their convictions and committed rape. Furthermore, Höss had no compunctions about forcing Jewish women to be sex slaves in the camp's official brothel. In typical self-serving style, he justified the brothel on the grounds that it would eliminate homosexual behaviour.

The Allies were privy to the atrocities in Auschwitz prior to the successful escape of four prisoners from the camp in April and May 1944. But after Rudolf Vrba, Alfred Wetzler, Arnost Rosin and Czeslaw Mordowicz escaped, the BBC and The New York Times broadcast and published stories about its existence.

One of the last group of Jews sent to Auschwitz were from the Lodz ghetto, which was liquidated by the Germans in August 1944. Shortly afterward, following a mutiny of crematoria workers (Sonderkommandos) at two crematoria, Himmler ordered them destroyed to wipe out evidence of mass murder.

According to Rees, 1.3 million individuals were transported to Auschwitz, of whom 1.1 million were devoured by it. The Jews of Hungary were the main victims, losing 438,000 people. The other primary victims were from Poland (300,000), France (69,114), Holland (60,085), Greece (55,000), Czechoslovakia (46,099), Slovakia (26,661), Germany and Austria (23,000), Belgium (24,906), Yugoslavia (10,000) and Italy (7,422).

Of the 6,500 members of the SS who worked in Auschwitz and survived the war, only some 750 ever received punishment of any kind. In other words, close to 90 per cent of the murderers got off scot-free.

Groening, who lives a life of ease in Germany today, hardly feels guilty. As he told Rees, "It's always like that in the world… What happened before is irrelevant."

Israeli singer pursues stardom in Toronto

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

If passion were gold, Ofir Ronit Engel would be rich.

Over a cup of hot chocolate at a mid-town Toronto café, on a chilly, winter afternoon, the 26-year-old Israeli explains why she didn't think twice about leaving her family, and the Mediterranean climate, to chase her dream of becoming a star singer-performer in Toronto.

"I love performing. It's a bug that won't go away… [When I'm performing] I'm generating something the audience didn't have before."

After spending some time in New York and then returning to Israel to help care for her mother who had complications from diabetes, Engel says she realized that to fulfil her dream, she needed to be in North America. She recorded a demo CD and sent it out to a number of record labels. One Toronto label got back to her.

"As soon as I picked up the phone they said, 'Ofir, you are amazing,'" Engel says. "I knew I had to come and see them."

Ofir Ronit Engel

And so the singer-songwriter now considers Toronto her home. But Engel's journey is just beginning and she's discovered it takes a lot more than just passion to make it in the music world. The record company, which is keen to back her, is only offering to invest 50 per cent of the production cost. The rest, Engel says, she has to come up with herself. And that means finding $25,000.

"It's hard," she says. "You come from nowhere with an idea and everything is all set to go… I have 12 songs all ready. And now I'm just waiting."

Potential investors from Israel have not worked out, and Engel says she's had her fair share of disappointments. However, refusing to give up, she continues to write new songs, practise every day and look for opportunities to perform around the city. She is also a certified massage therapist and is currently working in massage to make some money.

It's not the first time Engel has had to take a round-about route to pursue her dream.

"In New York, I did all sorts of odd jobs. I was even in the pilot episode of Sex in the City as a dancer in a club. Sarah Jessica Parker was right next to me!" she says. "It's like you're near everything, but it's not happening for you."

But slowly, things did begin to happen for Engel. She entered contests in New York City and placed in the top 10 in the Carnegie Hall N.Y. Japanese-American Karaoke contest, and top eight in the Downtime Club Singing and Dancing Showcase.

Then, this past year, she received special recognition for her songwriting. Engel's song The Passion Show placed in the top five in the pop category of the VH-1 Save the Music Foundation song of the year competition. The Passion Show has become the basis for her demo CD, as well as her first music video, which she directed. She calls The Passion Show not only a song, but also a performance concept, and has a website, www.thepassionshow.com., devoted to it.

Engel doesn't only exhibit passion for her music. After learning about the earthquake and tsunami in Southeast Asia, she decided she needed to do something to help.

"I felt I identified with their pain," Engel says. "I didn't go out celebrating [over the holidays]. It was too sad."

Instead, Engel has arranged a toy drive for hospitalized children. She organized a drop-off box at Café Neo, 782 St. Clair Ave. W., and even got the café to agree to offer a free coffee or soft drink to anyone who brings in four or more stuffed animals. Engel plans to run the drive for the month of January.

Engel's interests have often been diverse. As an artist in high school, she performed in bands and stage productions but says she didn't always know she wanted to pursue music.

"I just knew my soul was coming out and wanting to say something."

As she waits for the opportunity to express herself to a wider audience, Engel continues to look for performance opportunities in Toronto. She says she is keen to be involved in charity productions, and has performed for sick children in Israel, as well as at a veterans' party in Long Island. She even changed her name from Ronit to Ofir because "Ofir means gold. And I want a gold record!"

So when asked about how Judaism influences her music, she brings the conversation back to faith.

"Life is not everything you want. But if you prove to God, if you pray hard, I think He'll answer. I think I'll be answered soon."

U.S. AUTHOR HELEN EPSTEIN'S 30-YEAR RELATIONSHIP WITH TORONTO

American writer Helen Epstein was in Toronto earlier this month to deliver a fascinating power-point presentation on the sports career of her father, Kurt Epstein, a champion swimmer and water-polo player who represented Czechoslovakia in many international competitions including (despite a Jewish boycott) the 1936 Berlin Olympics.

She spoke at a short conference called "Jews of Czechoslovakia as Social Canaries? Questions of Memory and Identity," organized by the Centre for Russian and Eastern European Studies and other departments of the University of Toronto.

The Prague-born Epstein, who grew up in New York and currently lives near Boston, first came to Toronto 30 years ago when the New York Times Magazine sent her here on assignment to interview a former Miss America contestant and daughter of Holocaust survivors who had settled here.

Helen Epstein

With that magazine article, Epstein became one of the first journalists to study the psychological after-effects inherited by children of Holocaust survivors. Her groundbreaking book, Children of the Holocaust, which appeared in 1979, has gone through numerous editions and is soon to be published in France.

"I wrote the book in Toronto," Epstein recalled. "I've visited many times since, and I know Toronto very well. I have many wonderful friends in Toronto, from both the Jewish and the non-Jewish communities."

Epstein also wrote Where She Came From: A Daughter's Search for Her Mother's History (1998), a family memoir that illuminates two centuries of Czech Jewish social history. Both a new English softcover edition and a Hungarian edition will be published soon, she said.

Her latest project is First Love, a memoir-in-progress that deals with "adolescence, sex, love, memory and friendship," she reported. "I'm in my fourth year of writing it and I think I just found a publisher for it."

The Harvard-affiliated writer and mother of two teenagers praised conference organizer Veronika Ambros of the department of Slavic languages and literatures and co-sponsor Derek Penslar, head of the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto, for hosting what she said was "a really good and very unusual" conference.

"There have been very few conferences on Czech Jewry. It was well attended."

The event also featured a display of portraits of Holocaust survivors by Czech-born commercial photographer Yuri Dojc of Toronto.

Broadway Melody: The Civic Light Opera Company presents the Rodgers & Hart musical Babes in Arms, which is best remembered as an MGM musical starring Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney. The stage show first appeared on Broadway in 1937 and introduced such popular favourites as My Funny Valentine, The Lady Is a Tramp and Johnny One-Note.

The Civic Light Opera production is reportedly the long-lost musical's first foray into Canada. It's being presented with full orchestra and chorus, largely as a spoof of old-time movie musicals. Fairview Library Theatre, Feb. 17 to March 5. 416-755-1717. www.CivicLightOpera.com

Names in the News: Arlo Guthrie, the 57-year-old hippie-era singer who performed at Woodstock and gained fame with his long narrative song Alice's Restaurant, joined with the Klezmatics in Los Angeles last month to perform Chanukah, Holocaust and Jewish children's songs written by his father, legendary American folksinger Woody Guthrie.

After Woody took Jewish dancer Marjorie Mazia as his second wife, his new father-in-law was initially cold to the match, but his mother-in-law, Aliza Greenblatt, became a friend and influence on Woody from the start. "She was a poet and songwriter in her own right, and immediately recognized Woody's talent," Arlo recently told the London Jewish Chronicle.

His famous father started studying Judaism after his marriage, said Arlo, who recalled growing up as a "Jewish kid" in Brooklyn. "He wanted to know what he had gotten himself into and, with his typical thoroughness, began reading every book he could find, and he took courses on Judaism at Brooklyn Community College."

The senior Guthrie penned some 3,500 songs including This Land Is Your Land. His daughter, Nora, discovered a sheaf of his Jewish lyrics after his death and they were later set to music by the Klezmatics.

One of Arlo's personal favourites is a chilling Holocaust ballad, written in the voice of a concentration camp inmate, about the sadistic wife of a Buchenwald commandant known as the "bitch of Buchenwald."

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 18. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

LONDON JEWISH MUSEUM EXPLORES DISRAELI LEGEND

Two hundred years after the birth of Benjamin Disraeli, the Jewish Museum in London, England, has mounted an exhibition illuminating key aspects of the life, career and character of the British prime minister who was nicknamed "the Sphinx" by his contemporaries and became a dominant figure of the Victorian Age.

Although Disraeli's Italian-born father broke with his Sephardi Jewish heritage and had the family baptized, Dizzy's Jewishness remained forever a part of his legend: he was widely portrayed as "the Jew" in the popular press. Even so, he became the favourite prime minister of Queen Victoria, who made him Earl of Beaconsfield. It was the family's critical break with Judaism, which occurred when Disraeli was 13, that made his political career possible, since practising Jews were not allowed to serve in parliament until 1858.

During his two stints as prime minister, Disraeli instituted many significant social reforms and helped shape the ideology of the Conservative Party as well as of modern political thought. He was also a novelist who penned a trilogy of well-read works of fiction. Eminently quotable, he gave the English language many colourful phrases, including "dark horse" and "bag and baggage," as well as epigrammatic sayings such as "No government is secure without a formidable opposition."

"Disraeli, A Man of Many Parts" examines his critical role in shaping Victorian England through a fascinating range of cartoons, documents, letters, books and objects. It also explores various questions relating to his politics and literary aspirations, his complex relationship with his Jewish origins and his intriguing relationship with the Queen.

Jewish Museum, Camden Town. Raymond Burton House, 129-131 Albert St., London NW1 7NB. Phone 020-7284-1997. Until Feb. 27.

Klezmer innovators bring it all back to Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

With a sound that is traditional enough for your bubbie and experimental enough for her 18-year-old grandchild, it's no wonder the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band has been alive and kicking for the past 17 years.

After a cross-country tour that took the innovative group to Montreal and the Maritimes, bandleader David Buchbinder and company have returned to their old stomping grounds to play Toronto on Feb. 5.

The gig at the Isabel Bader Theatre, called "The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band Brings it all Back Home," is a one-night celebration marking 17 years since the Bulgars first took the stage at the Clinton Tavern in Toronto in 1988.

Even though the band has been around since acid wash jeans were cool, Buchbinder says he's still excited about going back to his roots and playing the music he loves.

But the three-time Juno nominated band – which also includes Victor Bateman on double bass, Robert Stevenson on clarinet and bass clarinet, Marilyn Lerner on piano, keyboard and accordion, and Dave Wall on percussion and vocals – is determined to make this show different from anything fans have seen or heard before.

For one thing, with Daniel Barnes, the band's drummer, on hiatus, it will be the first time the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band has played without him.

In his place, the band has gone with a more traditional klezmer lineup and invited two special guests, Peter Lutek on saxophone and clarinet, and Stephen Donald on trombone.

"It will allow us to explore different sounds, making the sound more traditional. It allows a different approach to a traditional sound with a rich texture. It'll be less fusion," Buchbinder said.

Because the band's sound is always growing, developing and changing, Buchbinder said, it's hard to anticipate what the reaction to the upcoming show will be.

During the band's most recent tour audiences were unpredictable.

"Reactions have been mixed," Buchbinder said. "We've gotten standing ovations… but, there have been people that have gotten into fights because some want to hear traditional music and some want to hear something new."

He attributes the band's longevity to the fact it doesn't play the same music all the time, so fans never know what to expect.

The Toronto gig will continue the tradition.

"It will have a theatrical element, in the sense that we are trying to take people on a journey, trying to tell a story," Buchbinder said. "We've created a musical narrative. There will be no breaks between songs. One song will flow into the next."

That's not to say there will be no talking, but any talking will be scripted, he added.

"It's much more effective if you use the wisdom of theatre to bring people into something."

The Feb. 5 concert starts at 8 p.m. For tickets, call 416-872-1212, or visit www.ticketking.com.

Tafelmusik
Baroque Orchestra
The Worlds of Salamone Rossi with
EMMA KIRKBY

Wed, Feb 2 at 7pm
Thurs - Sat, Feb 3 - 5 at 8pm
Sun, Feb 6 at 3:30pm

Soprano Emma Kirkby and Tafelmusik tell the story of 17th-century Jewish composer Salamone Rossi. Confined to live in the Jewish ghetto yet revered by the Catholic ducal court in Mantua, Rossi was caught between two worlds. Emma Kirkby, a consort of singers, and members of the Tafelmusik Orchestra perform a selection of Rossi's Italian love songs, his Hebrew psalms, and some of his rich instrumental compositions.

Mockumentary inspired by minor league hockey

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to the CJN

In hockey, hooking can result in a penalty, but when it comes to the new CBC-TV, six-part critically acclaimed, minor-hockey-inspired mockumentary – hooking Canadian audiences is just what series co-creator and executive producer Howard Busgang, 46, is rooting for.

"The Tournament is about a journey of an atom hockey league – 10-year-old kids on the way to their first tournament in four years. They come from the town of Briarside. It is really about the hopes and dreams of parents through their kids. It is a bit of a reflection of the Canadian way of life," says Busgang, a Montreal native now residing in Los Angeles

Howard Busgang

"Every day there is some story about the craziness of minor hockey. We get wonderful comments from people about their stories. I can't believe how far people go.

"We have a character Barry, who built a long hallway into the next county, so that he could put his kid into a better class team, and I just heard a story about a couple who are pretending they are divorced, so they can have another address – the same kind of story."

Busgang began his career doing Jewish shtick as a stand-up comic in Montreal, before there were any comedy clubs in the city. In 1983, his stand-up career took him to Toronto before landing him in L.A. in '88.

"A friend of mine, a stand-up comic named Marty Putz, came to my house one morning, made me pour him coffee and started talking about how he always wanted to do something about a minor league hockey – he grew up in it as a kid in Calgary. We started talking about what goes on in the game with the parents," says Busgang.

"It is just one of those things. I would like to think we were geniuses, but it was a no-brainer – it was just a matter of how we wanted to execute it. We came up with this notion of doing it documentary style – it is not just about being entertaining. But we wanted people to occasionally feel uncomfortable because what is going on is so lifelike.

"I had a relationship with the CBC because I had done a show, An American in Canada. I pitched them The Tournament and we got on the air very quickly," says Busgang.

So he temporarily left the warmth of L.A. and his 16-year-old daughter, Alexandra, to shoot The Tournament back home in Montreal.

The Tournament's cast is relatively unknown. That's a plus according to Busgang who doesn't want a famous face to take away from the storylines. Alain Goulem, who plays Barry, heads the ensemble cast. Arguably, the most recognizable face on the series belongs to hockey legend Phil Esposito.

Busgang left stand-up 10 years ago to sit at a desk and create television shows. His passion for the medium is clearly shown through his impressive list of credits, including CBS' Good Advice and The Closer, Family Channel's The Mighty Jungle, the ABC hit series Boy Meets World and UPN's Grown-ups. Busgang won a Gemini Award for the pilot of An American in Canada and the Writer's Guild of Canada screenwriting award for the pilot episode of The Blobheads.

"For the last year, The Tournament has really consumed me. I am really proud of what we've done and whatever happens, I hope it will strike a chord with people and we will come back. If you can't make a show about kids' hockey in Canada that people want to watch, then I'll probably end up going into menswear.

"I hope people get as much a kick out of watching it as we did making it, because I think it is a hoot. If people can see a bit of themselves in this show, then I think we've done a good job and hopefully we will be back for many, many years. There are a lot of tournaments out there that we can cover... every year the stakes get higher and higher because the kids get closer to being professional," adds Busgang.

The Tournament airs on CBC-TV on Monday nights at 8:30 pm until Feb. 14.

Teen chess whiz now an international grandmaster

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Mark Bluvshtein's performance at last fall's 36th annual Chess Olympiad in Mallorca, Spain, showed why his designation as an international grandmaster was no fluke.

Bluvshtein accumulated 8.5 out of a possible 12 points and finished as the top Canadian at the event, which is recognized as the world team championships.

The 16-year-old's new status as a chess grandmaster, the game's highest ranking, makes him the youngest Canadian ever to earn that distinction. It's something he says he's proud of, but won't dwell on.

"It feels good, but it doesn't change much in my life or in my chess," Bluvshtein said upon his return from what was his second Olympiad appearance. He also participated at the 2002 competition in Slovenia.

Bluvshtein is widely regarded as Canada's top chess player at the moment, though he finished third after a tie-breaker at the national championships in August. He also took part this year in high-level tournaments in Winnipeg and Montreal.

Under the system employed by FIDE, the World Chess Federation, Bluvshtein has accumulated 2,502 points in his career, while masters are those who have racked up 2,200 or more. A grandmaster would normally rate about 2,500, and the world's top players have ratings of about 2,800.

"Becoming a grandmaster was my goal," he said. "Now, I'm looking forward to becoming the Canadian champion. My long-term goal is obviously making it to the top 10 in the world."

Originally from Yaroslavl, 200 kilometres north of Moscow, Bluvshtein has been playing chess since his father Ilia taught him the game when he was five years old. He credits his dad's influence for his success.

Bluvshtein came to Canada with his family in 1999 after spending six years in Israel. He continues to travel the globe, taking part in chess competitions. Last year alone, he travelled back to Russia while also playing tournaments in Cuba and the United States.

A Grade 11 student at Toronto's Newtonbrook Secondary School, Bluvshtein says he doesn't play much in Canada, preferring to study the game on his computer as a form of practice.

"It involves analyzing previous games and finding mistakes," he said. "There are always mistakes that a player makes. The higher you go, the less visible they are."

Bluvshtein does play a little on the Internet, matching himself up against selected players with a high rating.

While dedicating about 15 hours a week to the game, Bluvshtein also enjoys playing basketball, tennis and soccer. He was a member of his school's championship junior soccer team in 2003.

While hopeful of making some future earnings playing chess, he says he's keeping his options open and plans to attend university in a couple of years.

For reaching grandmaster status, he collected $7,000 in September from the Chess'n Math Association, a non-profit organization dedicated to bringing chess to schools across Canada, and he has now pocketed close to $20,000 over the course of his career.

Kapler will play in Japan next season

CJN News services

Gabe Kapler, a Jewish baseball player who has a Star of David tattooed on one leg and the motto "Never Again" on the other, has announced he will play next season in Japan.

An outfielder with the World Series champion Boston Red Sox, Kapler inked a one-year deal to play for the Yomiuri Giants.

Kapler has called himself a role model for young Jewish fans, but decided to play on Yom Kippur during the team's pennant race. He explained his decision by saying, "I am not really a practising Jew. It would be selfish to be a practising Jew on only one day."

The 29-year-old Kapler is a .272 career hitter with 61 homers and 281 RBIs. For the Red Sox in 2004, Kapler hit .272 with six homers and 33 RBIs in 290 at-bats.

He was one of 16 free agents with the Red Sox and the first to sign elsewhere.

"He had a way of making an impact in a game when he played, and he had a way of being an important part of the club when he didn't play. That was a nice combination for a guy on the bench," said Red Sox manager Terry Francona.

Kapler's fierce competitiveness and love for the game was likely a driving force in his decision to go to Japan.

"He spent the better part of a week really agonizing over the decision," agent Paul Cohen told the Associated Press. "He really felt at this point in his career, he wanted the guarantee to play."

A sexy diet?

I lived in New York City in the early 1990s. I was a naive young woman away from home for the first time, so I soaked up the culture and lifestyle around me. Also included in my wide-eyed eagerness to learn about the world were the latest trends, fashions and styles.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

I recall walking along Broadway Avenue to my apartment one autumn evening after an exhausting day of theatre training and gazing at a bus-shelter advertisement displaying a young British model named Kate Moss. She had a pretty brown-haired "girl next door" look, but the only thing different about her and the real girl next door was that Moss was devastatingly skinny. However, the most striking feature of the poster was that someone had vandalized it and written "Feed me" in black marker across her face and body. Moss went on to become a supermodel. She made waif-like models fashionable and set the bar for future women in the business.

Last week, in New York, when I was waiting in a long lineup to buy groceries, I glanced at the magazines near the checkout counter. Each one displayed headlines announcing the latest diets, how to look beautiful, and which celebrity lost the most weight in as short a time as possible. The craziest magazine headline of all proclaimed, "Sexy New Diet Secrets: Hollywood's latest ways to get thin fast." I have never heard of a sexy diet before and I wondered if it came with a glass of champagne and a long-stemmed red rose.

Despite my better judgment, I opened the magazine and saw the before-and-after photos of celebrities who had lost weight. I was horrified. They looked great before the weight loss and uncomfortably skinny afterward. Some of them looked absurd as a result of a combination of extreme weight loss and previous plastic surgery – but that's another issue.

In the magazine, under the subheadings "Newly slim stars"; "How you can lose weight too"; "Hollywood's weight winners," and "Confidence through dieting," celebrities gave their diet secrets and discussed the importance of being thin.

It saddens me that the role models young people have today are so insecure and overly concerned with their appearance. Everything has gone downhill over the last decade and not enough is being done to counteract the damage the pressure to be thin causes our youth – especially young women.

When I was an actor living in Hollywood a few years ago, I knew many female models and actors who survived on only coffee, cigarettes and seaweed. The pressures and demand for them to be thin was outrageous, and unfortunately today, in countries miles from Hollywood, these pressures exist for people not even working in the film and television industry. The pressure to be thin has spread like a virus from Hollywood to many other parts of the world, infecting us through the magazines we purchase.

Perhaps if our culture didn't demand and expect women to be thin and beautiful they would not feel pressured to look that way. Of course, these magazines are supported by multiple media depictions that relentlessly reinforce the image of skinny and stunning.

But why do we continue to buy these trashy magazines if the repercussions are so harmful? Is it possible, if the market were not as strong, the publications would slow down production? Unfortunately, quite the opposite is happening, because there seems to be an unlimited supply of new magazines promoting the latest diets and thin bodies. They are sprouting up like weeds and the shelves are packed with them.

There are so many other brilliant books and magazines – including health and fitness – that will make you feel good about yourself while inspiring your soul or educating your mind.

I do my best not to allow the pressures of society control my life even though I have been guilty of asking the question, "Do I look fat in this dress?" But I always know in my heart that inner beauty is much more important.

TUNNEL OF FUDGE CAKE

Cake
1 3/4 cup sugar
1 3/4 cup margarine, softened
6 eggs
2 cups powdered sugar
2 1/4 cups flour
3/4 cup unsweetened cocoa
2 cups chopped walnuts

Glaze
3/4 cup powdered sugar
1/4 cup unsweetened cocoa
4-6 tsps. milk

Heat oven to 350°F. Grease & flour 12-cup Bundt pan. In large bowl, combine sugar & margarine; beat until light & fluffy. Add eggs 1 at a time, beating well after each addition. Gradually add 2 cups powdered sugar; blend well. By hand, stir in flour & remaining cake ingredients until well blended. Spoon batter into greased & floured pan; spread evenly. Bake for 45-50 mins. Cool upright in pan on wire rack 1 1/2 hours. Invert onto serving plate; cool at least 2 hrs.

In small bowl, combine glaze ingredients, adding enough milk for desired drizzling consistency. Spoon over top of cake, allowing some to run down sides. Store tightly covered. Cake has a soft filling; an ordinary doneness test cannot be used.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Even though the season has passed, the annual Christmas-Chanukah debate has significance beyond December.

Living in a Christian majority culture, we are subjected each year to a variety of thoughts about the proximity of the two holidays. Of course, Christmas is much more central to the faith of its celebrants than Chanukah is to Jews. Even though it lasts eight days, Chanukah is a minor Jewish holiday, with nothing of the holiness of our pilgrimage festivals, our High Holy Days, or even the weekly Shabbat. Most significantly, its historical account does not even appear in the Bible.

Still, both holidays fall on the 25th of the darkest winter month in the two calendars (in our Northern Hemisphere, where these traditions began) and both have themes of light. An astute student of the history of both holidays might find some interesting "mother" sources, but the two celebrations developed into completely unrelated festivals, each a part of two very separate spiritual traditions.

I bring this to your attention, because here, too, our culture has abused the notion of pluralism. Both Jews and well-meaning Christians have fallen into the trap of assuming that our Canadian mosaic demands a pareve approach to December that offends no one. We have turned Merry Christmas, Happy New Year and Chag Urim Samayach into Happy Holidays, which celebrates nothing in anybody's tradition. Jews should feel comfortable enough in 21st century North America to witness the Christian majority openly celebrating the birth of their messiah, while we openly publicize the miracle of our continuing spiritual growth in the face of a very different majority culture.

A pluralism that does not reduce opposing views to mush that is digestible by all but rather glories in the specifics of each worldview and permits many of them to co-exist is a pluralism that both minority and majority cultures should foster and teach their children.

Jews who are both comfortable with their Judaism and literate in its history need not feel slighted when Christians celebrate their spiritual heritage. If Jewish pride and comfort are well-transmitted to the next generation, all Canadians will benefit from a more generous form of pluralism.

Israel, the tsunami and the Diaspora

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Our Israeli brothers and sisters are brave and inventive.

Imagine the fear that must lie within the gut of every Israeli, living in a cauldron of stress surrounded by always strategizing foes. Cleverly, however, Israelis have transformed their anxiety into a virtue and evolved into a creative, heroic, inventive, generous and lightning fast team with the skill, talent and shrewdness of a Rubik's Cube champion.

URBAN WRITER

Israel's unparalleled national response to the tsunami in Southeast Asia – perhaps the most devastating international crisis in history, which has left millions homeless and 150,000 dead – is sparkling evidence of its radiance, especially in the area of crisis response.

Within two days of the tsunami, Israeli relief personnel, including search and rescue teams and delegations of doctors co-ordinated by the Israeli Ministry of Health, were on their way to disaster sites in various countries.

In early January, the Israel Campaign for Southeast Asia Disaster Relief, spearheaded by IsraAID, an Israeli forum for international aid consisting of Israeli and Jewish aid groups, sent a team of medical and logistical personnel to Sri Lanka to work near the southern city of Matara.

The team includes medical personnel from Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's equivalent of the Red Cross, and logistical personnel from the humanitarian arm of the kibbutz movement.

The team established a field clinic, offering local medical assistance with an emphasis on pediatrics and infectious diseases. Alongside the clinic, a Jewish emergency feeding station was erected, with three large kitchens serving nutritious meals to thousands of people left homeless. The group travelled with relief items such as pharmaceuticals, kitchen supplies and tents, and is laying the groundwork for future emergency medical and feeding projects.

In Israel, MDA stationed 4,000 volunteers and workers in front of supermarkets to encourage Israelis to donate basic food. Forty-five Israeli groups opened donation drop-off warehouses all across Israel.

Members of Meshi-Zahav's Orthodox Jewish rescue services group ZAKA travelled to a resort area in southern Thailand, together with Israeli dental, fingerprint and DNA experts, to help find and identify bodies. Known as "the team that sleeps with the dead," ZAKA's forensic workers have matched body parts to identities after innumerable terrorist attacks in Israel.

The tsunami elicited munificent responses from around the world. The work of organizations such as the International Rescue Committee and Doctors Without Borders deserves huge praise. The courage and skill of their professionals and volunteers in the field, and their administrative ability to raise vast sums of money and implement enormous and unique operations, is astounding. Jewish support for such organizations is crucial.

I am, however, overwhelmed by, and deeply proud of, the heightened consciousness of the citizens of our tiny State of Israel and their sharply intelligent and intuitive efforts to help the people of 11 countries (some without diplomatic ties to the Jewish state) immediately after those tearful waters receded.

Israel is, and has always been, the member of the Jewish family who intrepidly wades out into the fronts and fields of peril to defend our land and people everywhere, never imposing guilt or resentment on us. For decades, our Israeli kin have also acted masterfully as a "hands-on" light unto the nations through their tikkun olam work in impoverished countries and during times of crisis.

It is, therefore, imperative and right that we, the Diaspora side of the mishpachah, generously commit ourselves, to financing the State of Israel's masterful relief operations and hands-in-hand express the Jewish value of tzedakah – justice – and chesed – kindness.

60 years ago, 'liberated'

This horrific image of the prisoners at Auschwitz-Birkenau is one of many horrific images that a disbelieving humanity began to see after Jan. 27, 1945. For it was on that frigid day in late January, 60 years ago, that the gates to that unspeakable Nazi hell were thrown open by Allied Soviet troops.

In truth, the Nazis and their confederates had already run away by the time Soviet soldiers entered the death camp's gates. But only then, when Allied forces took control of that domain of death, was the pitiable human remnant liberated.

But what exactly did liberation mean? In the blood-soaked chaos of Europe, where could they go? Whom could they trust?

Could they return to their former countries, let alone to their homes? Indeed, what remained of their homes? What remained of their belongings? And most pressing, who, from among their families and friends, remained alive?

Editorial

See stories pages 47-51

Many of the "liberated" died of weakness, disease and despair merely days after the Soviets arrived. But those who survived must be counted among the truly heroic figures of their generation – not that they survived by heroism, for, more often than not, they survived by chance and circumstance. But that they chose to build their lives anew, to stand for goodness and to fight for hope, was indeed heroic.

When people around the world reflect upon the wider "messages" of the liberation from Auschwitz-Birkenau some 60 years ago, let us first and foremost reflect upon and pay tribute to the survivors who, in the ordinariness of their restored lives, showed subsequent generations the true meaning of heroism.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Wallenberg Honoured

SASKATOON — In a service last Monday at Agudas Israel Synagogue, Saskatoon's Jewish community honoured Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who helped save thousands of Hungarian Jews in Budapest during World War II. Attended by MP Lynne Yelich, MLA Judy Junor and Saskatoon Mayor Don Atchison, the event marked 60 years since Wallenberg's arrest by the Soviet Union. Jan. 17 is Raoul Wallenberg Day in Canada.

WORLD

Liberation Recalled

BUDAPEST — Ceremonies in Hungary last week commemorated the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Budapest Ghetto. The main event was in Budapest's Dohany Synagogue, where dignitaries, including Hungary's president, prime minister and speaker of Parliament, took part in a Jewish commemoration for the first time. Other events in Budapest recalled Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved Jews there in 1944 but vanished after the war.

Jews Beaten

MOSCOW — Two men, aged 19 and 26, are being held for a Friday-night attack on two rabbis. One rabbi, Alexander Lakshin, who leads the Russian Jewish community's anti-missionary activities, was beaten Jan. 14 by youths who shouted "kikes" while kicking him and hitting him with bottles. He received head injuries and a bone in his back was broken. Two hours before, a Jewish couple was attacked in the same underground street crossing where the rabbis were beaten.

Girls Recovering

KYIV — Two Jewish girls are recovering from injuries received in a Jan. 8 anti-Semitic attack on 13 Orthodox children in southern Ukraine. Sveta Abramovich, 16, received a concussion, and Natasha Zhvakalyuk, 11, had surgery on her nose. The students and two adults from a Chabad day school in Simferopol were beaten by a group of young men, ages 17 to 20, as they walked home from services.

Police Probe Attacks

LONDON — Recent attacks on Jews in north London are linked, British police say. Police are looking for a group of Asian and black men who allegedly committed the assaults in London's Stamford Hill section in the past two months.

Clash at Terror Rally

SAN FRANCISCO — Pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian demonstrators clashed at a Jan. 16 anti-terror rally in Berkeley Calif., organized by the Israeli Action Committee of the East Bay, the San Francisco Chronicle reported. One person was arrested after some of the 200 counter-demonstrators carrying Palestinian flags marched into a mostly pro-Israel crowd of about 500. The rally featured a bus destroyed in a Jerusalem suicide attack last year.

Swastika Ban Urged

LONDON — Prince Harry's decision to wear a Nazi costume at a party may prompt a symbolic Europe-wide ban on the use of Nazi symbols. The European Union's top justice official, Franco Frattini, said he is considering a ban after calls by European lawmakers. Meanwhile, Harry is reportedly planning to meet with Britain's chief rabbi to discuss this month's incident.

WWII Suspect Named

CANBERRA — Police are probing claims that an Australian retiree in Perth was a Hungarian Nazi soldier who murdered a Jew in Budapest in 1944. Charles Zentai, 86, is already the subject of an investigation by Hungary's foreign ministry. The Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center also says it has extensive evidence against him.

UNRWA Head Leaves

NEW YORK — Peter Hansen, the head of UNRWA, the UN agency for Palestinian refugees is not being re-appointed and will leave at the end of March, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said. Israeli and U.S. pressure over his alleged pro-Palestinian bias reportedly led to his ouster.

But Will it Help Sales?

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush urged Americans to read Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky's book The Case for Democracy. Bush has already ordered his senior staff to read it and has adopted its demands for democratic reform as a precondition for Palestinian statehood. Bush told CNN that he had reached many of the same conclusions before reading the book by Sharansky, a survivor of the Soviet Gulag, but that it perfectly reflects his outlook.

Jews Thank Pope for Outreach to Israel

ROME — Some 160 Jewish officials thanked Pope John Paul II at the Vatican last week for his outreach efforts to Israel and the Jewish world.

Pope John Paul II at the Kotel in 2000

The delegation, which included rabbis, cantors and Jewish officials from Europe, Israel and North America, visited under the auspices of the Pave the Way Foundation, a New York-based group that promotes religious understanding.

The rabbis – representing several streams of Judaism – offered a collective blessing for the 84-year-old Pope, and the cantors chanted the Shehechiyanu prayer.

The Polish-born John Paul was the first pope ever to visit a synagogue, stopping in Rome's main synagogue in 1986. During his papacy, the Vatican established diplomatic relations with Israel, and he visited the Jewish state in 2000.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the Vatican's Nostra Aetate declaration, which opened the door to formal Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

School funding opposition shakes community

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – FEDERATION CJA says the furor over the now-scuttled increased provincial funding to Jewish day schools did not descend into anti-Semitism, but many in the community are shaken by the vehemence of the opposition in the media and from the public.

Federation president Sylvain Abitbol said that "the debate was intense, but civil and honest," and he does not believe relations between the community and other Quebecers are damaged.

Abitbol said the community is disappointed by the cancellation of "associate status," but agreed that it could not proceed after one of the two school boards involved, the French-language Commission Scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, reversed its decision to partner with Jewish schools. Abitbol said the community also had to respect the overwhelming opposition from Quebecers.

He reiterated the community's desire to find other ways to "build bridges with our fellow Quebecers" and said he appreciates that two cabinet ministers will be working with all communities on better ways to integrate children.

Bram Freeman, the federation's director of operations and strategic objectives, conceded there "certainly were some hints of anti-Semitism in the comments made, but it would be a mistake to attribute the opposition generally to anti-Semitism."

A poll found that 90 per cent of Quebecers were against funding being increased from 60 to 100 per cent.

"If it was another cultural group, the reaction would have been the same," Freedman said. "I think we all just need to take a deep breath now."

Premier Jean Charest, however, deplored the "demagogy and prejudice" that characterized the objections to the funding when he announced the cancellation Jan. 19.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko found the commentary in French-language newspapers particularly disturbing.

"The imagery of rich Jews out to wield their power to the detriment of others is unconscionable. It shows that on the slightest pretext, all bounds of decent behaviour are off."

Rabbi Poupko said there are valid reasons for opposition and there could have been "a healthy debate in good faith," but that did not happen.

"When a daily newspaper can run a cartoon linking the firebombing of United Talmud Torahs to the funding, it's breathtaking in its audacity," he said.

He was referring to a La Presse editorial cartoon in which Education Minister Pierre Reid says to a visitor: "Mr. Singh, if your school gets firebombed we can arrange funding for you, too."

Magazine, a weekly paper distributing 21,000 copies door-to-door on the South Shore, carried an editorial by Gilles Petel denouncing funding to "a community that controls a good part of the western economy and supports without reservation its political leader, the criminal Ariel Sharon, whose country legalizes torture and carries out genocide of the Palestinian people with the complicity of the Americans."

B'nai Brith Canada regional director Bill Surkis senses that the outcry's "underlying motive was anti-Semitism.

"It's as if you only need to scratch the surface [to reveal prejudice]. Personally, I find that extremely troubling."

Editorials in La Presse and Le Devoir that suggest there is "a powerful Jewish lobby [are] reminiscent of the charges made in the Protocols [of the Elders of Zion]," Surkis said.

B'nai Brith received "nasty" phone calls "expressing grievances against the Jewish community," most of which were left on voice mail after hours, he said.

Surkis said he is not sure what can be done to heal the ill-feeling he sees sparked by the funding controversy. "There are real, deep fears in the community. It's going to take a while to limp back from this."

Chartered accountant Stanley Yetnikoff watched events unfold with particular interest. In the 1960s, he was active with the Committee for Tax-Supported Jewish Schools, which succeeded in getting "associate status" with the now-defunct Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal and about 80 per cent funding around 1968.

Classical ancient sites

From the editor's desk

Last month, I spent five days in Israel as the guest of the Ministry of Tourism. My itinerary consisted mainly of visiting places and people I had never seen or met before. In this column, as in the two previous columns, I record some of new and exciting moments that even this veteran visitor to Israel experienced.

The land of Israel is a geographic gem. Its many-faceted geologic, climatic, vegetational and topographic aspects offer inexhaustible visual and other delights to the traveller. But it is, after all, history and memory that lock into place our spiritual, religious, cultural and communal connection to the land of Israel.

The Book is the chief instrument that ties our memory to our history. But modern archeology has increasingly become an aid to The Book, helping cinch the connection in the mind of the doubting modern.

It was therefore with the heart-pounding anticipation akin to someone counting on seeing his first rainbow that I visited two classically ancient archeological sites.

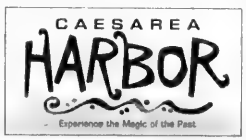
Caesarea was the capital city of the Roman army in conquered Judea for about 500 years. King Herod, the paranoid, cruel Jewish ruler, but renowned builder and municipal planner, founded the city around 22 BCE and named it in honour of Augustus Caesar.

Most people know Caesarea, which is a bit more than halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa, as the location of Israel's only golf course and as one of Israel's 60 or so national parks. It is also known as the site of the ruins of the port and of the Roman theatre on the shores of the deep blue Mediterranean adjacent to Kibbutz Sdot Yam. Within the last year, however, Caesarea has become a great deal more.

The Caesarea Edmond Benjamin De Rothschild Foundation and the Caesarea Development Corporation have recently invested approximately 30 million NIS to create the Caesarea Harbor project.

The harbour project expands, refurbishes and reorients the impressive Caesarea antiquities into a world-class, multi-experiential, educational and recreational attraction for Israelis and tourists alike.

The designers have recreated the ancient Caesarea harbour, as it were, in an edifice that artistically weds imagination to reality. Modern science and technology enable us to envision what our ancient scribes recorded and our builders built through state-of- the art, computer-assisted, holographic and film "time travel."



A 10-minute film takes the viewer on a cinematic expedition through the many different cultural and historic eras of the city and then, in the newly built Time Tower, a three-dimensional animation provides a view of the vast harbour vista of ancient Caesarea.

In addition, unique interactive computers enable one to "talk" to some of the great historic figures of the area, such as Herod, Rabbi Akiva, Saladdin, Baron de Rothschild and Hanna Senesh, to name a few.

But the project also offers restaurants, cafés, hiking trails though the antiquities and scuba-diving facilities to view the underwater ruins of the harbour and, of course, the stunning beach for which Caesarea was always famous.

It is a compelling "Ceasarea experience," ancient and modern, that now awaits the curious visitor to that important place of Jewish history.

In the opposite direction to Caesarea, due south, on the northeast shore of the Dead Sea, is another of Israel's national parks, Qumran. It is the archeological site of the Essenes, a religious grouping who lived there for about two centuries at the time of the Second Temple, from the end of the Hashmonean period through the great revolt of the Jews against the Romans.

The Essenes were ascetics who lived a self-reliant, ritualistic, communal life.

Essene scribes wrote and hid the scrolls in the nearby caves that were found in 1947 by Bedouins and that are now, in part, on display in The Shrine of the Book in Jerusalem.

The archeological site reassembles the very rooms and halls in which the Essenes lived and worked. A short film in the small museum features items used by the Essenes and depicts their way of life based on contemporary writings and especially those of the Jewish historian Josephus.

Walking through the carefully preserved antiquities is a singularly soul-stirring experience. The shifting, stark beige and brown rock formations of the desert set against the high blue sky are breathtaking. The silence of the area is total and enveloping. The only sound one hears is the scrape of one's shoe against the desert rocks or the tick-ticky chirping of the Dead Sea sparrows. Occasionally, a car speeds by on the highway in the distance.

Herod and the Essenes were contemporaries. In a strange way, a visitor to Caesarea and Qumran becomes their contemporaries as well. It is a chilling and inspiring experience. –MBD

FORECASTING THE WEATHER: Global TV meteorologist Michael Kuss, seen here with some of the students, recently visited the Grade 5 class at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School as part of its integrated unit on weather. Kuss taught the students about the highs and lows of air pressure and gave them some insight into what is involved in predicting the weather.

Israeli group monitoring Palestinian media

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The recent Palestinian presidential election campaign, widely applauded for complying with democratic norms, was actually riddled with voter fraud, intimidation and unbalanced pre-election media coverage, says an Israeli observer of Palestinian political life.

Michael Widlanski, a political science and communications lecturer at Hebrew University, said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was aided in his campaign by a compliant Palestinian press that gave short shrift to his opponents.

Widlanski, along with journalist David Bedein and and researcher Arnon Gross, presented his findings at a lecture at the Toronto Zionist Centre last week.

While the media did not ignore other candidates entirely, as they did with former PA president Yasser Arafat's opponent in his 1995 campaign, they sandwiched their comments on interview programs with a flood of ads favouring Fatah, the organization Abbas represents, Widlanski said.

Abbas was also given fawning treatment in Al-Quds newspaper, the most moderate and independent Palestinian paper, which receives a monthly $45,000 (US) stipend from the Palestinian Authority, he said.

Abbas' most serious opponent, Marwan Barghouti, jailed by Israel for murder, withdrew from the campaign after his family was threatened and after Abbas promised that if elected, he would push Israel to release him and other Palestinian prisoners.

On election day, even with the weight of the Palestinian political apparatus behind Abbas, it appeared voters might respond to the anti-corruption campaign of his main opponent, Mustafa Barghouti, a distant relative of the jailed killer.

Gun-toting Fatah operatives burst into election commission headquarters, fired some shots, and demanded that the polls remain open an extra two hours. In that period, "no-one checked to see if anyone voted more than once," Widlanski said.

Despite all his advantages, and after dedicating his campaign to Arafat, Abbas still won only 62 per cent of the vote, he added.

Bedein, Gross and Widlanski are closely monitoring Palestinian media and school textbooks "to bring to people's attention what the other side says to its own people in their own language," Bedein said.

Recent elections said riddled with voter fraud, intimidation

Bedein's Israel Resource News Agency recently launched an "Abu Mazen Watch," a reference to Abbas' nickname.

"The purpose is to expose the reality of Abu Mazen's administration," Bedein said. It will monitor Abbas' actions on four fronts: terrorism, incitement, freedom of speech and dissent, and Palestinian refugees.

During a visit to Canada, Bedein, Widlanski and Gross briefed officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, as well as MP's political aides and members of the Privy Council, on their findings. During a stop in Washington, D.C., they spoke to congressional aides and members of the media, and they are planning similar meetings with members of the European Parliament in Strasbourg.

Widlanski, a native New Yorker who is fluent in Arabic, said 46 members of the Palestinian election commission resigned in protest after the strong-arm tactics on election day.

Abbas, meanwhile, campaigned on a platform that praised Arafat and vilified the United States and Israel, even going so far as to claim that Israel planned to blow up the Al Aqsa mosque, Widlanski said.

As Israelis were targeted by terror attacks in the waning day of the campaign and afterward, Abbas' "TV and radio stations ran items that took credit for the attacks," and his own affiliated organization, the Al Aqsa Martyr's Brigade, claimed joint responsibility for the incidents with Hamas, Widlanski noted.

Widlanski said Abbas differs from Arafat on more than style. "Abbas does not think violence is the answer right now.

"He has a dialectic view of the conflict" that owes much to his education and Patrice Lumumba University in Moscow, a KGB educational institution for Third World activists and terrorists, he said.

The Soviet strategy when Abbas attended was not to confront the United States directly, but to support wars of liberation.

"I believe this is Abbas' philosophy," Widlanski said, adding that Abbas is following the old Soviet line that believed the United States would fall apart if the Russians played their cards correctly.

Gross, deputy director of the Voice of Israel's Arabic Service, said his analysis shows that peace, reconciliation and the history and rights of Jews get short shrift in Palestinian school books.

Instead, Jews are described as foreigners to Palestine with no rights there, while Israel is solely described as an occupying power and a source of harm to its neighbours, and Israeli-occupied lands, which include pre-1967 territories, are seen as targets for liberation.

Wallenberg's 'heroism' cited by justice minister

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Raoul Wallenberg's "unparalleled and unprecedented heroism" in Nazi-occupied Europe is an example of humanitarian relief and intervention that the world should emulate in the ongoing struggle for human rights, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler says.

In a passionate and powerful speech kicking off a high-powered human rights symposium at York University last week, Cotler paid homage to the legendary and deceased Swedish diplomat who saved 100,000 Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust.

Irwin Cotler

Human Rights Symposium

The two-day conference, which took place against the backdrop of continuing human rights violations in the Darfur region of Sudan, attracted a procession of legal scholars and professors, five chief justices of Canadian superior courts, overseas guests and a plethora of law students from across the country.

Cotler, a former McGill University law professor and president of Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke on Jan. 17, which the federal government has designated as Raoul Wallenberg Day in Canada.

He urged attendees to the conference, held at Osgoode Hall Law School, to reflect on and be inspired by the heroics of Wallenberg, the first of only two foreigners who have been granted Canadian honorary citizenship.

In rescuing imperilled Jews, Wallenberg personified the talmudic principle that a person who saves a single life saves an entire universe, said Cotler, who served as honorary counsel to such former prisoners of conscience as Nelson Mandela and Andrei Sakharov.

Wallenberg showed that one caring committed person can make a difference and transform history. "We must remember always that human rights begins with each of us," Cotler declared.

He added that a just society can be built on the basis of Wallenberg's shining legacy.

Speaking 10 days before the 60th anniversary of the Allied liberation of the Auschwitz death camp, Cotler said a "critical juncture" in the battle for human rights and security has been reached.

"We are witnessing a literal explosion in human rights standard-setting," he noted, citing the formation of global criminal tribunals in the mid-1990s to bring war criminals in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia to justice and the establishment in 2002 of an International Criminal Court.

Cotler said a number of "existential lessons" in the human condition have been learned from Wallenberg and the United Nations charter.

• The dangers of assaultive speech. Cotler said the Holocaust began with inflammatory, hate-filled words, not in the gas chambers of Nazi concentration camps.

"Some 60 years later, these lessons not only remain unlearned, but the tragedy is being repeated," he said, referring to state-sanctioned "trafficking in hate" and ethnic cleansing in such countries as Rwanda, Bosnia and Cambodia.

And in Western nations, including Canada, there is a growing incidence and intensity of hate speech and hate crimes against minorities such as Jews, he warned.

Cotler mentioned the vandalizing of synagogues, the desecration of cemeteries and the firebombing last year of his alma mater, the United Talmud Torahs school in Montreal.

He said racial hatred is an assault on the dignity and worth of a person and the values of a free, democratic society.

"The message of our democracies must be clear. There can be no sanctuary for hate, no refuge for bigotry."

• A principled approach to counter-terrorism. Arguing there is no contradiction between security and human rights, Cotler said the enforcement and application of counter-terrorism law and policy must always converge with the rule of law and should not single out minorities for "differential and discriminatory treatment."

• Crimes of indifference. Cotler said the Holocaust and genocides from Rwanda to Cambodia succeeded because of silence. "It is our responsibility, then, to break down the walls of indifference, to shatter the conspiracies of silence wherever they may be."

Quoting novelist and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, Cotler said, "Indifference always means coming down on in the side of the victimizer, never on the side of the victim."

He added, "What is required is moral leadership as demonstrated by Raoul Wallenberg, the willingness to stand up and be counted."

• Protecting human security to promote a culture of prevention. "It is as trite as it is profound that the best protection against mass atrocities… is the prevention of conflict," he said.

In the meantime, governments should foster democracy, support national justice systems and promote anti-racist education curricula.

• The responsibility to protect. The international community has a duty to act, militarily if necessary and depending on circumstances, if states do not or cannot protect their populations from mass atrocities, or if states themselves are the perpetrators, Cotler said.

• Bringing war criminals to justice. Cotler said the creation of the International Criminal Court was a milestone in ending what he described as "the culture of impunity" – failing to prosecute war criminals.

• The rights of children and the protection of children in armed conflict. Cotler said the infringement of children's rights, from their involvement in prostitution to their displacement as refugees, must end.

• Women's rights and gender security. "The lessons of violence against women – from the Balkans to Darfur – in armed conflict remain to be learned and must be acted upon," he observed.

Use force if necessary to fight atrocities: Rock

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada is in favour of using collective military means to respond to Rwanda-like cases of mass atrocities, the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, Allan Rock, told an international human rights symposium at York University last week.

Human Rights Symposium

But such force should be used only as a last resort, he added.

Rock urged the UN to establish a standing army that can be dispatched to trouble spots swiftly whenever needed.

In the meantime, he noted, Canada would support the passage of a UN resolution backing armed intervention in countries where basic human rights are being violently suppressed.

According to Rock, mass atrocities in the future might even be prevented if the UN acts on this issue.

At the moment, however, there are no hard-and-fast rules governing an international response to mass atrocities, he pointed out.

Current diplomatic etiquette respects the sovereignty of UN member states and opposes intervention in their internal affairs, he explained.

The concept of humanitarian intervention to address extreme human rights abuses began to crystallize after the Rwanda genocide in 1994.

But Rock suggested the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq "muddied" the proposition that armed intervention on behalf of an oppressed population is justified.

Georgette Gagnon, deputy director of Human Rights Watch, Africa division, called on the UN to send a large military contingent to Sudan to stop ethnic cleansing in the Darfur region.

Saying that "horrific crimes" are being committed in Darfur by the government-backed Janjaweed Arab militia, Gagnon voiced regret the UN has handed over the file to the African Union, which she said is incapable of resolving the problem.

She estimated that 1.2 million people have been displaced in Darfur, where they lack sufficient food, water and shelter.

She urged Canada to support a UN resolution referring Darfur to the International Criminal Court, which came into existence more than two years ago.

Joel Richler, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the struggle against the spectre of genocide requires swift international action. But political considerations get in the way, he acknowledged.

Richler said non-governmental organizations, such as Amnesty International, play a vital role in exposing human rights violations.

With satisfaction, he said the number of NGOs have increased exponentially since the convening of a UN human rights conference in 1993.

Congress, on a case-by-case basis, is prepared to work with other Canadian advocacy organizations on a wide array of human rights issues, he said.

Frank Iacobucci, a former justice on the Canadian Supreme Court and now interim president of the University of Toronto, said Canada should respond to terrorism within the rule of the law.

He suggested the battle against terrorism can be perverted if the wrong people are detained or arrested and if officials act improperly or illegally. "The stakes are immensely high," he warned.

As an example of governments violating citizens' rights when responding to national emergencies, he cited the internment of more than 20,000 Japanese Canadians during World War II.

Judges must adopt a "principled approach" when dealing with terrorist cases so they strike a balance between the interests of the individual and the state.

Judges, too, must be independent of the legislative branch, and the process under which they work should be open and transparent, he observed.

Iacobucci said the role of judges is to ensure democracy and the rule of the law are shielded from abuse. Otherwise, democracy will be unable to protect judges.

The need for national security in a situation where terrorism threatens a nation is recognized, but basic Canadian values should not be sacrificed on the altar of security, he said.

Claire L'Heureux-Dube, also a former Supreme Court justice, criticized U.S. opposition to the formation of the International Criminal Court.

American concerns that U.S. soldiers serving abroad might be prosecuted for war crimes are "highly exaggerated," she claimed, because the court guarantees due process and the presumption of innocence.

And, she pointed out, the court would not violate U.S. sovereignty.

Catherine Beagan Flood, an adjunct professor at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School, warned national identification cards to thwart terrorism could backfire.

Listing the race and ethnicity of its holders, such cards could lead to the discriminatory treatment of some citizens, she said, citing the misuse of ID schemes in Nazi Germany and Rwanda.

And Canada's plans to phase in biometric passports, based on facial recognition techniques, could be problematic because its data base might be used for different purposes. This raises serious privacy concerns, and cards would not necessarily prevent terrorism, she said.

Beagan Flood said better intelligence-gathering methods are more likely to have an impact on security than national identification cards.

Associated postpones exams after stomach flu outbreak

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Grade 7 and 8 students at Associated Hebrew Schools are writing their exams belatedly this week after dozens of students at its Danilack Middle School came down with a stomach flu two weeks ago.

The middle school, which has 520 students, called in Toronto Public Health (TPH) "to help us determine how to deal with this kind of situation," said Mark Smiley, Associated's director of education, adding that the department was "more than helpful."

Measures taken included specialized cleaning, the provision of anti-bacterial handwash, and a recommendation that students stay at home for 48 hours after their symptoms disappeared.

Dr. Michael Finkelstein, associate medical officer of health at TPH, said a cluster of this type of illness is "not unusual at this time of year."

A TPH letter distributed to parents by the school said 82 students were absent the week of Jan. 10.

Typically, Public Health becomes involved when there is an unusual pattern of absenteeism or a number of sick calls indicating a particular illness, Finkelstein said.

Of 60 Associated students or parents interviewed by TPH, most reported symptoms that included vomiting, diarrhea, nausea, headache and/or stomach cramps lasting 24 to 48 hours, suggesting a Norwalk-like virus, according to the Public Health letter.

Norwalk, also known as Norovirus, is the cause of most stomach flus, Finkelstein said. It is characterized by sudden onset, short duration, and gastrointestinal symptoms.

The virus is "very rarely serious," but it is highly contagious, said Finkelstein.

He emphasized the importance of handwashing in reducing the spread of the virus.

Politics of public funding

Montreal FEDERATION CJA president Sylvain Abitbol succinctly expressed the feelings of most members of the community about the government of Quebec's decision last week to withdraw the possibility of full funding of the secular portion of Quebec Jewish schools' curriculum. He was appreciative of the government's efforts, but "deeply disappointed" nonetheless.

Publicly announced by Minister of Education Pierre Reid merely five weeks earlier, on Dec. 9, at the rededication ceremony of the restored library of the St. Laurent branch of United Talmud Torahs, the program could not survive the level of angry protest that surged last week in Montreal like an eruption of hot lava from a smoldering volcano. Once the French-language Marguerite Bourgeoys school board voted not to renew past this June the newly entered funding arrangement with the five Jewish schools that had signed on, there was no practical way to continue with the initiative.

Public opposition against the funding swelled rapidly and demonstrably after La Presse published a front page article early in the week that insinuated a link between the government's decision to offer full secular studies funding and a fundraising event last year within the Jewish community for the Liberal party of Quebec. More than 90 per cent of Quebecers were said to be strongly opposed to the funding.

That article, however, steered the public debate on the funding in a regrettable direction. It encouraged some of the opponents of the funding to hint at or explicitly suggest the usual, but tiresome and unseemly, accusations of deferential treatment for a powerful Jewish lobby. The truth, of course, as it always is, was vastly different from the conspiratorial schemes imagined by the demagogues.

- The Jewish community of Quebec has always electorally and financially supported the Liberal party of Quebec.
- The Liberal government of Quebec promised to extend the secular studies funding in 1994. It was the Parti Québécois that refused to fulfil the promise after the 1994 election even though it extended full funding for secular studies in the Greek and Armenian community schools.

But the demagogues were the minority. Most of the opposition to the funding was expressed on substantive grounds. The timing of the decision was wrong, they felt. The funds earmarked for the Jewish schools should go to the financially strapped public school system instead. The current 60 per cent level of funding to the private schools was sufficient. Moreover, the public bridled at the funding in the face of the recent withdrawal of $100 million in bursary funding to university students. And the process also seemed wrong. Many of the cabinet ministers and members of the National Assembly had been unaware of the decision made by the education minister and the premier.

The Quebec government's reversal, back to a 60 per cent level of funding, was indeed disappointing. Such is the misunderstood politics of public funding for secular studies in private schools. Unfortunately, Quebec's decision will undoubtedly reinforce Ontario's resolve to maintain its unfair and discriminatory policies of no public funding whatsoever.

Israel's response to the tsunami disaster

It was good to see how quickly Israel responded to the tsunami disaster. Four doctors from Israel's Hadassah Hospital were dispatched to Colombo, Sri Lanka, at the request of the Israeli foreign ministry, including the hospital's head of general surgery and trauma, its chief of pediatrics and two anesthesiologists.

Sri Lanka had initially rejected the arrival of a 150-member Israeli rescue and relief team because, it stated, it could not accommodate all the team members. But a smaller Israeli contingent arrived soon afterward, and food and medical supplies from Israel have been accepted. The Sri Lankan government also noted the "friendly and close diplomatic relations" between the two countries.

Israeli search, rescue, welfare and medical teams have been dispatched throughout the affected area, including Muslim Indonesia, where an El Al 747 delivered 60 tons of aid. The International Committee of the Red Cross even asked Magen David Adom to help out.

Israel faces the possibility of death and destruction daily. But it has shown that it has not forgotten about the suffering of others. In a time of need, the Jewish state proved it has a Jewish heart.

Jewish Canadian Military Museum

I would like to clarify that the Jewish Canadian Military Museum is not associated with the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

The Jewish Canadian Military Museum is a non-profit charitable organization with a registered tax number.

The purpose of the Jewish Canadian Military Museum is to recognize the contribution that Canadians of the Jewish faith have made toward the defence of Canada for more than 200 years, from the time of Gen. James Wolfe, the commander of the British expedition that took Quebec in 1759, to the Boer War, World War I, World War II and the Korean conflict, as well in current peace-keeping operations. Canadian Jews have served and are serving well beyond their numbers percentage wise, compared with other ethnic groups.

Our purpose is to educate the community and those in other countries, as well as future generations of Canadian Jews, with exhibitions honouring our warriors of yesterday and today.

Vicious article about settlers

As I was reading Jean Gerber's article ("Messianic settlers put all of Israel at risk," CJN, Jan. 20), like her, I began to feel uneasy, and the more I read, the more uneasy, I became.

Can it be that a Jewish newspaper would print an article demanding that a large part of our Jewish country become Judenrein. That it could print such a vicious, anti-religious article and not fear a backlash from its readership?

I hope and pray that there are enough Jews who will finally wake up to the fact that we are being besmirched by the paper that is supposed to defend us and to champion the cause of Jews everywhere, no matter where they live.

The Red Cross and the Holocaust

I shall never condone the Red Cross, whose philosophy is to practise humanitarianism ("Historian examines Red Cross role during Holocaust," CJN, Jan. 13). Representatives of the Red Cross ignored the organization's doctrine when they witnessed the tortures in Hitler's death camps and did not act.

Clever headline is misleading

I was frustrated to see the headline and sub-headline on Barbara Silverstein's article about downtown Toronto's Riverdale Shul ("Riverdale Shul survives near-death experience: Members save Danforth synagogue from financial collapse," CJN, Jan. 13).

The implication your editors have made with these clever phrases is that the story is over and there's nothing more to report. But Silverstein's article clearly indicates the shul still needs long-term stable funding and support from community benefactors as well as from individuals willing to invest their own time and money into the effort.

While the synagogue needs commitment from its members in order to survive, the members cannot work alone. Ongoing community support is crucial. Without it, there may be another "near-death" experience – and the outcome might not be so auspicious.

The last 10 days in Auschwitz

Primo Levi, the noted writer and chemist who died in 1987, wrote one of the first accounts of life as an inmate in Auschwitz. The following excerpt from Survival in Auschwitz, Collier Books, 1961, describes the last few days of his imprisonment in the concentration camp, leading up to Jan. 27, 1945, when the Russians arrived. Levi had fallen ill with scarlet fever on Jan. 17 and was thus in the Ka-Be, the infirmary, for the 10 days before the Russian army liberated the camp. Most of the camp outside the hospital was evacuated that night.

Primo Levi

By PRIMO LEVI

January 18: During the night of the evacuation, the camp kitchens continued to function, and on the following morning the last distribution of soup took place in the hospital. The central-heating plant had been abandoned; in the huts a little heat still lingered on, but hour by hour, the temperature dropped and it was evident that we would soon suffer from the cold. Outside it must have been at least 5 degrees F below zero; most of the patients had only a shirt and some of them not even that.

Nobody knew what our fate would be. Some SS men had remained, some of the guard towers were still occupied.

About midday an SS officer made a tour of the huts. He appointed a chief in each of them, selecting from among the remaining non-Jews, and ordered a list of the patients to be made at once, divided into Jews and non-Jews…

The two Frenchmen [Charles and Arthur] had not understood and were frightened. I translated the speech of the SS man. I was annoyed that they should be afraid: they had not even experienced a month of the Lager, they hardly suffered from hunger yet, they were not even Jews, but they were afraid…

There were no clocks, but it must have been 11 p.m. when all the lights went out, even those of the reflectors on the guard-towers… A cluster of intense lights burst out in the sky, remaining immobile, crudely illuminating the earth. One could hear the roar of the airplanes.

Then the bombardment began…

After a few minutes it was obvious that the camp had been struck. Two huts were burning fiercely, another two had been pulverized, but they were all empty. Dozens of patients arrived, naked and wretched, from a hut threatened by fire: they asked for shelter. It was impossible to take them in… We had to barricade the door…

The Germans were no longer there. The towers were empty…

January 19: At dawn, we went out into the wind of a freezing day of fog, poorly wrapped up in blankets. What we saw resembled nothing that I had ever seen or heard described.

The Lager, hardly dead, had already begun to decompose. No more water or electricity, broken windows and doors slamming to and fro in the wind, loose iron-sheets from the roofs screeching, ashes from the fire drifting high, afar. The work of the bombs had been completed by the work of man: ragged, decrepit, skeleton-like patients barely able to move dragged themselves everywhere on the frozen soil, like an invasion of worms. They had ransacked all the empty huts in search of food and wood; they had violated with senseless fury the grotesquely adorned rooms of the hated Blockälteste… No longer in control of their own bowels, they had fouled everywhere, polluting the precious snow, the only source of water remaining in the whole camp…

Others had found potatoes somewhere and were roasting them on the embers of the fire, glaring around with fierce eyes…

[Later] in the darkness, lighted only by the glow of the embers, Arthur and I sat smoking cigarettes made of herbs found in the kitchen, and spoke of many things, both past and future…

January 20: The dawn came and it was my turn to light the stove [we had taken from the kitchen]. Besides a general feeling of weakness, the aching of my joints reminded me all the time that my scarlet fever was far from over…

Arthur climbed down enthusiastically from his bed and heated three potatoes per person from those boiled the day before; after which, Charles and I, starved and shivering, left again to explore the decaying camp.

We had enough food (that is, potatoes) for two days only; as for water, we were forced to melt the snow, an awkward operation in the absence of large pots, which yielded a blackish, muddy liquid which had to be filtered.

The camp was silent. Other starving spectres like ourselves wandered around searching, unshaven, with hollow eyes, grayish skeleton bones in rags. Shaky on their legs, they entered and left the empty huts carrying the most varied of objects: axes, buckets, ladles, nails; anything might be of use…

Sitting in bed, I could see a large stretch of the road through the window. For the past three days the Wehrmacht in flight had passed by in waves…

January 21: On the dawn of the 21st, we saw the plain deserted and lifeless, white as far as the eye could see, lying under the flight of the crows, deathly sad. I would almost have preferred to see something moving again. The Polish civilians had also disappeared, hiding who knows where. Even the wind seemed to have stopped. I wanted only one thing: to stay in bed under my blankets… waiting as indifferently as a dead man for it to end or not to end.

But Charles had already lighted the stove, Charles, our active, trusting, alive friend, and he called me to work: [It was my turn to empty] the lavatory bucket, which every morning had to be carried outside and emptied into the cesspool; this was the first task of the day, and if one remembers that it was impossible to wash one's hands and that three of us were ill with typhus, it can be understood that it was not a pleasant job…

January 22: If it is courageous to face a grave danger with a light heart, Charles and I were courageous that morning. We extended our explorations to the SS camp, immediately outside the electric wire-fence…

On the tables we found plates half-full of a by-now frozen soup which we devoured with an intense pleasure, mugs full of beer, transformed into a yellowish ice, a chess board with an unfinished game. In the dormitories, piles of valuable things.

We loaded ourselves with a bottle of vodka, various medicines, newspapers and magazines and four first-rate eiderdowns, one of which is today in my house in Turin. Cheerful and irresponsible, we carried the fruits of our expedition back to the dormitory, leaving them in Arthur's care. Only that evening did we learn what happened perhaps only half an hour later.

Some SS men penetrated into the abandoned camp. They found that 18 Frenchmen had settled in the dining hall of the SS-Waffe. They killed them all methodically, with a shot in the nape of the neck, lining up their twisted bodies in the snow on the road; then they left. The 18 corpses remained exposed until the arrival of the Russians; nobody had the strength to bury them…

January 23: Our potatoes were finished. For days, the rumour had circulated through all the huts that an enormous trench of potatoes lay somewhere outside the barbed wire, not far from the camp… By the morning of the 23rd a section of the barbed wire had been beaten down and a double file of wretches went in and out through the opening.

Charles and I left, into the wind of the leaden plain. We were beyond the broken barrier…

Perhaps 400 yards from the camp lay the potatoes – a treasure. Two extremely long ditches, full of potatoes and covered by alternate layers of soil and straw to protect them from the cold. Nobody would die of hunger anymore…

January 24: Liberty. The breach in the barbed wire gave us a concrete image of it. To anyone who stopped to think, it signified no more Germans, no more selections, no work, no blows, no roll calls, and perhaps, later, the return…

All around lay destruction and death.

The pile of corpses in front of our window had by now overflowed out of the ditch. Despite the potatoes, everyone was extremely weak: not a patient in the camp improved, while many fell ill with pneumonia and diarrhea; those who were unable to move themselves, or lacked the energy to do so, lay lethargic in their bunks, benumbed by the cold, and nobody realized when they died…

January 25: It was Sómogyi's turn. He was a Hungarian chemist, about 50 years old, thin, tall and taciturn. He suffered from typhus and scarlet fever. He had not spoken for perhaps five days…

Half his face had swollen. As long as he retained consciousness he remained closed in a harsh silence.

But in the evening and for the whole of the night and for two days without interruption, the silence was broken by his delirium. Following a last interminable dream of acceptance and slavery he began to murmur: "Jawohl!" with every breath, regularly and continuously like a machine… enough to make one want to shake him, to suffocate him, at least to make him change the word.

I never understood so clearly as at that moment how laborious is the death of a man.

Outside the great silence continued. The number of ravens had increased considerably and everybody knew why. Only at distant intervals did the dialogue of the artillery wake up.

We all said to each other that the Russians would arrive soon, at once; we all proclaimed it, we were all sure of it, but at bottom, nobody believed it. Because one loses the habit of hoping in the Lager, and even of believing in one's own reason…

January 26: We lay in a world of death and phantoms. The last trace of civilization had vanished around and inside us. The work of bestial degradation, begun by the victorious Germans, had been carried to its conclusion by the Germans in defeat.

It is man who kills, man who creates or suffers injustice, it is no longer man who, having lost all restraint, shares his bed with a corpse… Part of our existence lies in the feelings of those near us. This is why the experience of someone who has lived for days during which man was merely a thing in the eyes of man is non-human. We three were for the most part immune from it, and we owe each other mutual gratitude…

But thousands of feet above us, in the gaps in the gray clouds, the complicated miracles of aerial duels began. Above us, bare, helpless and unarmed, men of our time sought reciprocal death with the most refined of instruments. A movement of a finger could cause the destruction of the entire camp, could annihilate thousands of men…

The saraband stopped at night and the room was once again filled with Sómogyi's monologue.

In full darkness I found myself suddenly awake. "L'pauv'-vieux" was silent; he had finished. With the last gasp of life, he had thrown himself to the ground: I heard the thud of his knees, of his hips, of his shoulders, of his head…

January 27: Dawn. On the floor, the shameful wreck of skin and bones, the Sómogyi thing.

There are more urgent tasks: we cannot wash ourselves, so that we dare not touch him until we have cooked and eaten. And besides: "rien de si dégoutant que les débordements," said Charles justly; the latrine had to be emptied. The living are more demanding; the dead can wait. We began to work as on every day.

The Russians arrived while Charles and I were carrying Sómogyi a little distance outside. He was very light. We overturned the stretcher on the gray snow.

Less oy, more joy

Deborah Lipstadt became famous when the anti-Semite David Irving sued her for what she wrote about him in her important book on Holocaust denial. After six difficult years, the case came to trial in England and Irving lost badly. Since then, she has become something of a celebrity, apart from being a distinguished academic and an acknowledged expert on anti-Semitism.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Last month, she gave the keynote address at an international conference on Jewish education in Jerusalem. Her message was reflected in words she learned from a friend, who urged the Jewish community to concentrate less on the "oy" of Judaism and more on its joy, less on woes and dangers and more on privileges and opportunities.

Lipstadt warned against the tendency to make victimhood the main theme of Judaism by using the Holocaust as the point of reference for almost any issue. Such distortion, in the late Salo Baron's famous words, makes for a lachrymose view of Jewish history and that is very far from the truth.

Her words had special poignancy, for she spoke only days after a shameful attempt by Jewish settlers in Gaza to "adorn" themselves with orange stars, suggesting that, because of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan, they were now like Jews wearing the yellow star on their way to Auschwitz.

Though Lipstadt acknowledged the persistence of anti-Semitism, she pointed to many positive features of contemporary Jewish life and encouraged Jewish educators to celebrate them. Life on university campuses, for example, is nowhere near as bleak as many Jewish leaders try to make it seem in their vain and improper efforts to elicit greater community cohesiveness and support.

Of course, anti-Semitism must be fought, but not in ways that give succor to its perpetrators. She cited Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ as a case in point. Had Jewish organizations not created such a furor, the film would not have made all those millions and its creator would not have become an icon for Jew-haters.

Lipstadt learned how to deal with anti-Semitism from Anthony Julius, the brilliant Jewish lawyer and himself the author of a book on T.S. Eliot's anti-Semitism, who represented her at the trial. I paraphrase: "Treat anti-Semites like dirt you have trodden into. Wipe it off your shoes as quickly as possible and don't bring it home."

The title of her lecture was a reference to the Passover Haggadah: "In every generation they stand up against us to destroy us…" Had she completed the quotation, she might have made an even stronger case why we must not bring the filth into our homes: because "the Holy One blessed be He rescues us from their grip."

When are jokes anti-Semitism?

Until I came to university, the entirety of my experience with anti-Semitism consisted of reading books about the Holocaust and participating in discussions about the topic at my Jewish day and high schools. I even participated in a black-Jewish dialogue group about anti-Semitism and racism during high school, and realize now that I knew less about the issue than I thought.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Since I've been here, anti-Semitism has become something that I experience and that affects me in a much more personal way. It is clear to me that anti-Semitism is experienced by each person in a way that is unique and that our reactions to it are often inexplicable.

The most common debate that my fellow Jewish students and I have is over what criteria warrant the label of the "A-word." Often, my non-Jewish friends simply can't understand why I find certain jokes or comments so offensive. And knowing that they don't mean any harm or just don't understand means feeling the need to pick my battles and forgive them – albeit reluctantly.

Recently, I heard a small group of 14-year-old boys on a bus cracking jokes. One of them commented that another had "Jewed" someone they knew. When my friend saw me flinch, she said I shouldn't let it bother me, but I couldn't help it. Hearing the word Jew used in a derogatory way strikes a chord with me, regardless of any rationally acceptable argument about harmless intentions, immaturity or ignorance.

On another occasion, I found myself defending my emotional reaction to an issue of The Peak, the Simon Fraser University student newspaper. It dealt with the topic of anti-Semitism on campus, following up on a controversial piece published in a local newspaper. The newspaper's cover was plastered with a collage of Stars of David and read, "Is SFU an Anti-semitic Campus? No, but find out why…" Inside, Peak writers had interviewed two Jewish students and five non-Jewish students, only one of whom stated he had a Jewish friend, and all of whom clearly could not relate to any Jewish student's experiences of discrimination on campus.

This offended me for a couple of reasons. First, the newspaper had not made a thorough investigation into an important issue that affects Jewish students' experiences and memories of our careers as university students. Second, it pitted us against them in the debate over what qualifies as anti-Semitic, and presented Jewish students as playing the role of the boy who cried wolf, as stirring up controversy over a non-issue.

But to most of my friends, the newspaper had not been anti-Semitic because it did not say bad things about Jewish people. I don't blame them or think them insensitive; they just can't relate. Sometimes, however, my friends and I surprise each other.

Over the past week, I have received several e-mails and have been approached in the halls at school by campus friends and acquaintances who had heard about the controversy surrounding Prince Harry's choice of a Nazi get-up for a costume party he attended. While moved by the show of sympathy for the prince, I can't help but wonder where it comes from.

In fact, I happen to be a little bit entertained by the prince's choice of costume. On Purim, we encourage Jewish children to assume the dress of Haman, the evil character from Megillat Esther, and we don't worry that this promotes Jew-hatred or trivializes the great historical losses associated with state anti-Semitism. Similarly, when people dress up as the devil for Halloween, we have no reason to assume that they participate in devil worship. Had Prince Harry been wearing a Nazi armband in the street, I would be deeply hurt, but given the context of a costume party, the point of which is to dress up as something you're not, I don't feel offended at all.

It is a struggle to explain to those around me the intricacies of my reactions to various anti-Semitism-related issues, but I hope that engaging in rational debate will further the goal of educating for tolerance.

The OC makes Yiddishkeit cool

Seth Cohen. Just mention the name and girls swoon. Tall, dark and cute, completely unattainable – and kinda Jewish. All my good friends – not one would deny it – have a crush on Seth Cohen. For those of you lacking any knowledge of pop culture, he is the nerdy, long-winded Jewish character on The OC, the new millennium's answer to the 1990s hit Beverly Hills 90210.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

The OC offers a wonderfully delusional depiction of affluent suburban teenage life in Orange County, Calif., replete with alcohol abuse, relationship turmoil and family drama. And while its plot complexities could fill this column, I want to delve a little deeper.

The character of Seth has brought the image of the gangly and verbose, yet sensitive and sweet, Jewish boy to new heights of popularity. Created in the image of the show's writer and producer, 20something Josh Schwartz, Seth Cohen brings to light the greatness of Jewish neuroses, Yiddishkeit and of course, bagels and cream cheese.

Because of The OC, blond bad boys have ceded their heartthrob status to a precocious and scrawny Jewish kid. The show's self-described "Aryan" character, Ryan, played by Benjamin Mackenzie now plays second fiddle to Seth, played by real-life Jew Adam Brody. And it can't be ignored that in real life, Brody is dating his non-Jewish co-star, Rachel Bilson, evoking the greenest jealousy in Jewish girls everywhere.

On Beverly Hills 90210, Andrea Zuckerman was the token nerdy Jewish character, but her religion and culture seemed incidental. A curly brown-haired keener who cared about her grades, Andrea was a foil for the show's blond beauties. Aside from the ethnicity of her name, and one episode where her Judaism posed a problem for the sorority she wanted to join, her Judaism was of little significance.

The OC, by contrast, offers a real glimpse of a modern, assimilated and non-religious North American Jewish family. Seth is the son of a California blond – the perfect self-described "shikseh" – and her Jewish Brooklynite husband. Seth talks about his bar mitzvah and helps to educate his non-Jewish girlfriend before she comes to the family seder. Through Seth and the Cohen family, Judaism is given a prominent role on the show, and even more importantly, it's the key to what makes the Cohens, and Seth in particular, so cool.

Ironically, Kirsten Cohen, Seth's mom, never converted, so Seth wouldn't even be considered halachically Jewish. Yet Judaism is fundamental to his personality, and it's essential to the Cohen family's identity.

For example, their witty banter is laced with Yiddish idioms, and Jewish humour pervades their actions and interactions.

On one particularly memorable episode, while everyone else anticipates Christmas, Seth launches a campaign to popularize "Chrismukkah," his self-created holiday that celebrates both Jesus and Moses and combines eight days of gifts (Chanukah) with one really huge day of gifts (Christmas).

On another episode, as a family scandal erupts, Seth astutely explains how family members use humour to deal with the issues facing them, and in doing so, he describes a fundamental aspect of Jewish culture.

Humour aside, Seth's identity as a child of intermarriage allows The OC to incorporate Jewish elements into mainstream Christian traditions that are ubiquitous on the small screen. As well, the show looks at how Jewish identity factors into non-religious North American Jewish life.

It also exposes people who have never encountered Jews to Jewishness and Yiddishkeit. And while Judaism on mainstream television has often evoked controversy, or been a source of shame or struggle for characters (as is the case on The West Wing for the Toby Ziegler and Josh Lyman characters), The OC portrays it as a positive source of identity.

Judaism has never been cooler, and Yiddish is reaching the masses.

Of course, you might wonder whether it is only cool for a character to be Jewish if he or she is half-Jewish, and if the person is both willing and culturally able to mix Judaism with the culturally dominant religion.

But given the superficial character of The OC, it seems safe to conclude that there is little wrong with a show that succeeds in making Yiddishkeit trendy.

The Kirshner File

Jews of Calcutta are a vanishing breed

When David Nahoum, 80, was a boy, the polished Burmese teak benches in Magen David, the Calcutta synagogue he and his family regularly attended, were always full on Saturdays and High Holy Days. "They had to use folding chairs to accommodate the overflow of worshippers," recalled Nahoum, the proprietor of a popular bakery in the heart of Calcutta.

Sheldon Kirshner in Calcutta

But nowadays, Magen David – a striking late-19th century red-brick building graced by arched stain-glassed windows, green shutters, beige stone trim, creamy walls, 14 stolid columns and a black and white marble floor lit by three chandeliers and cooled by hanging fans – is a museum rather than an active congregation.

"We can't even raise a minyan," lamented Nahoum, an ailing bachelor whose grandfather, a baker, immigrated to Calcutta from Baghdad in 1870 to join thousands of other Iraqi Jews who had already established themselves in India. "I could see 20 years ago that the community would dwindle. Every festival you came to there were fewer people."

At its height in the 1940s, when an infusion of Sephardi Jews from Rangoon, Burma, who were fleeing the Japanese occupation swelled the city's population, the Jewish community in Calcutta – the capital of British India until 1911 and an important centre of commerce before and after that – was home to some 6,000 Jews out of a total of about 30,000 Jews in India.

The vast majority of Calcutta's Jewish inhabitants – 99 per cent, Nahoum reckoned – were, like himself, Baghdadi Jews, who together with the Bene Israel and the Cochin Jews, historically comprised Indian Jewry. Collectively known as the Baghdadis, they were the last distinctive group of Jews to come to India as immigrants.

Although many of them were Iraqi, like Nahoum's grandfather, the ranks of the Baghdadis were also filled with a smattering of Syrian, Iranian and Yemenite Jews. Enticed to India – the jewel in the crown of Britain's overseas colonial possessions – in the first decades of the 19th century by religious persecution and commercial imperatives, the Baghdadi Jews lived in such thriving cities as Bombay (Mumbai), Surat and Calcutta. They owned textile and jute factories and traded in silk, coffee, ivory, diamonds, spices, indigo and opium. By the early 20th century, upwards of 10,000 Baghdadis resided in India, primarily in Mumbai and Calcutta.

Until his death in 1864 at his summer home in Pune, a town just south of Mumbai, David Sassoon, the scion of bankers from Baghdad, was their undisputed communal leader. A wealthy merchant and philanthropist, he and affluent Jewish families such as the Cohens and the Ezras contributed funds for the construction of institutions ranging from synagogues to schools.

With the advent of India's independence in 1947 and Israel's statehood less than a year later, the Baghdadi Jews began to leave India en masse. It was not a surprising development, given their identification with British culture and their fear of the Indian independence movement. In Nahoum's estimation, about 40 per cent went to Israel, 20 per cent – including his brother – immigrated to Britain, a further 20 per cent settled in Australia and the rest ended up in Los Angeles, Calif.

Nahoum, who took over the family business 18 years ago after a career as an engineer in a locomotive plant, remained in Calcutta if for no other reason than he was perfectly content in this bustling metropolis, where glaring disparities in wealth never fail to shock visitors from overseas. "I have a comfortable life here," said Nahoum, who uses a cane to walk. "I like Calcutta. It's my city. I have no hangups here."

Nahoum is a member of a fast-dwindling minority, the smallest in India. In all of Calcutta – a vital and raucous city of 14 million that resounds to the incessant honking of car horns and whose air quality is questionable at best – Jews are truly a vanishing breed. To the best of his knowledge, there are only about 30 Jews left in Calcutta today, and most of them are old.

To say that the community has shrunk dramatically would surely be an understatement.

Jo Cohen, a 58-year-old secretary whose husband deals in fencing materials, is by her own admission one of its youngest members. "There are no Jewish children here," said Cohen, who was born in Calcutta, the child of a mother from Cochin and a father from France who arrived in India in the 1930s to manage sugar plantations.

The bleak demographics speak volumes. Cohen told me that the last Jewish wedding and bar mitzvah in Calcutta took place about 25 and 30 years ago, respectively.

Her three children no longer live in Calcutta, having gone to the United States and Israel. Cohen, who described herself as an Indian by nationality and a Jew by religion, claimed that employment opportunities in India are simply too limited to prevent young Jews from emigrating.

"It's not a question of discrimination, but an ethnic Indian will gain preference in a job. There is a subtle tendency to employ, shall we say, your own kind rather than an outsider. There is little future for non-Indians."

Nahoum did not quite agree with her viewpoint. "This country has not discriminated against minorities. We all prospered here."

The current dearth of Jews in Calcutta is reflected in its silent synagogues, some of which have been closed for years, and in its Jewish Girls' School, which, though still in operation, has not has a Jewish pupil for at least a decade.

Magen David, whose protective high walls overlook a jumble of sidewalk vendors dispensing cheap bangles, beads and trinkets, is enclosed in a dusty courtyard dotted with palm trees and bamboo bushes.

It has seen better days.

The first floor sanctuary gives off a musty air of decay. Scrunched-up carpets in the second-floor women's gallery are torn and dirty. Portraits of Magen David's benefactors, one of which is of the late Elias Joseph David Ezra, look worn. Plaques alongside the steps leading into the shul pay homage to Sonny Solomon – a Royal Air Force pilot killed in action on Sept. 11, 1944 – and to one of its last rabbis, E.M.D. Cohen, who retired in 1927.

The Indian government has agreed to declare Magen David a national monument, Nahoum said. In the meantime, the building is maintained by rental income from Jewish properties in the neighbourhood and an existing trust fund.

Magen David, which has never been the object of an anti-Semitic incident, is cared for by four deferential Muslim men of various ages clad in dazzling white uniforms and Nehru caps. In the heat of the day, they generously offered me a cold bottle of pop.

David Nahoum, centre, and Jo Cohen, flanked by Muslim caretakers and Sheldon Kirshner, in the courtyard of Magen David synagogue.

Beth El, a nearby synagogue of approximately the same size in a predominantly Muslim part of town, already has the status of a protected monument. Neveh Shalom, a much smaller shul that has been shuttered for more than a decade and is situated in a busy market, appears neglected and abandoned. On a bulletin board inside, I found a frayed Hebrew-English calendar from 1987.

The Jewish Girls' School, which opened in 1881, ceased being Jewish, for all practical purposes, in the 1960s, Sraboni Chowdhury, its principal, said.

But there are echoes of its Jewish past. Scholastic honour rolls and photographs commemorating benefactors such as Aaron Curlender and a long-serving principal named Ramah Luddy crowd the walls of the auditorium.

Nahoum, a realist, realizes that the days of the Calcutta Jewish community are numbered. Asked how long he thinks it will last, he said wearily, "God only knows."

Certificate Program in Special Education

Tikun Chaim, the Special Education division of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, and York University are accepting applications for the second cohort of the Special Education Certificate Program.

The main goals of this program are:

- To develop an understanding of the variety of exceptionalities teachers may encounter and ways to address them
- To stimulate growth of knowledge and develop enriched teaching techniques
- To expand ways to maximize the learning opportunities of all students across the spectrum of exceptionalities
- To learn how to tailor Judaic/Hebrew Studies and General Studies curricula for the multi-level classroom

- Teachers must be employed for the 2005-2006 academic year in the Jewish School system.
- OCT teachers will be eligible to receive AQ certification.
- Midrasha and non-OCT teachers will receive a York University Special Education Certificate.

Enrolment is limited.

Alon Blumberger gives up smoking after 23 years

"Positive Changes Hypnosis has changed my life. I am actually able to relax now. I was able to reduce my stress AND quit smoking during my program. I had tried the patch, but I still had cravings. By quitting with hypnosis I have no cravings.

I absolutely recommend Positive Changes Hypnosis to anyone who wants to quit smoking and reduce stress in their life. Why not try it – tell them that Alon sent you."

Jewish Life

Of Redlers, Roths, Schulsingers and Celnikers

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Once again this column asks: What's in a name – or more particularly, a Jewish surname?

Roots & Remembrance

Over the last dozen years, Paris-based names scholar Alexander Beider has published several books in an attempt to answer precisely that question. His recently published A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from Galicia completes a trilogy begun more than a dozen years ago that also includes works on the Kingdom of Poland and the Russian Empire.

Beider was initially reluctant to focus on Galicia, he admits, due to a perception that most of its surnames were common, German-derived "artificial" monikers such as Goldman, Newman, Rosenberg and Silberstein that would reveal little or nothing about Jewish life. As he would find, surnames related to German colours (Roth, Schwarz, Weiss), size (Gross, Klein) wealth (Reich) and other characteristics were particularly popular.

"The frequency of these names implies that, in many cases, they were constructed in an artificial way, without any connection to personal characteristics of their first bearers," he writes. "Otherwise, the very large number of white/blond and red[-haired] Jews would be difficult to explain."

Gleaning tens of thousands of names from a variety of original 19th-century sources, Beider ranked them by popularity. The top 30: Katz, Friedman, Horowitz, Goldberg, Reich, Weiss, Landau, Singer, Neuman, Gross, Roth, Berger, Frankel, Haber, Schwartz, Klein, Stern, Ehrlich, Fuchs, Rosenberg, Schachter, Korn, Kaufman, Halpern, Brenner, Gottlieb, Stein, Adler, Weissman and Muller.

Much rarer appellations include these occupational names derived from Yiddish: Lachtermacher, a maker of candlesticks; Redler, from a tool for perforating matzah; Schadchen (also Hebrew), meaning matchmaker or matrimonial agent; and Schulsinger, or synagogue singer. From Polish: Celniker, a seller of sewing notions; Gomulka, a lump or home-made round cheese; and Szafarz, a dispenser, butler, steward, member of Jewish administration dealing with almshouses or Jewish rural servant. From Ukrainian: Szaposznik, a hatter or cap maker.

A relatively small number of Hebrew-based names also surfaced. Mendrisch derives from "midrash," meaning the body of post-talmudic literature of biblical exegesis. Talmuter derives from the prayer for "dew and rain" said during the months of drought in Eretz Israel. While Raschbam derives from the Hebrew acronym for Rabbi Shmuel ben Meyer, the medieval French Jewish scholar, not all of its bearers were his descendants. The names of illustrious rabbis were considered prestigious and often arose spontaneously in many places. Others include Frankel, Halpern, Heller, Horowitz, Landau and Schorr.

The dictionary documents the presence of a few Sephardim, mostly eminent physicians and prosperous tradesmen and their families, amid the Ashkenazi majority. Names include Kalahora, from the Spanish town, Calahorra, and Fortis de Lima, which originated as "chazak" (strong) in Hebrew and was translated into the Latin fortis, which also means strong.

Some names derived directly from Latin: Aspis (adder), Beatus (happy), Faber (smith), Junius (June), Midikus (from medicus, physician), Rubrum (red), Sartor (tailor), Septimus (seventh) and Wentus (from ventus, wind). Like various names with Latinate endings (Israeli, Jacobi, Samueli), they were all likely assigned by Austrian clerks.

It's well known that clerks sometimes maliciously imposed contemptuous or ridiculous names on hapless Jewish families. Previously documented examples include Deligtisch (criminal), Dollmann (mad man), Geschwur (ulcer), Harn (urine), Niemand (nobody) and Affengesicht (monkey's face). The dictionary retrieves a few more unkind monikers from the dustbin of history: Sauermilch (sour milk), Saufer (to drink, to booze), Schmalzbauch (fat belly), Schmalhosen (narrow trousers), Schmutz (dirt, mud), Schnupftabak (snuff tobacco), Teufel (devil) and Taufstein (baptism stone).

Ah, those clever state bureaucrats. With friends like them, who needed enemies?

A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from Galicia is published by Avotaynu, Inc. of Bergenfield, N.J. Its website is www.avotaynu.com.

Starting anew in a strange land

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This year is the 50th year since the first Moroccan Jews arrived in Canada. The following is part of a series about this immigration, a family saga.

Through A Sephardi Window

By the 1960s, most immigrants were arriving in Canada by air. Coming from European capitals, their planes would make their first landing in Montreal and then continue on to Toronto.

Amusing tales are told of these landings. An airplane's approach into Mirabel would take it over and across the city of Montreal. This was truly an amazing sight for the newcomers. The city was a large modern metropolis crisscrossed with thoroughfares – a virtually endless sea of blinking lights.

But for those people who had chosen Toronto as their destination, the plane would continue on. Unfortunately, Toronto failed to dazzle in the same way Montreal did. Planes coming into what is now Pearson International were routed around the city itself. Looking out their windows, before Mississauga had developed into what it is today, passengers arriving in winter would see nothing but open and windswept fields covered in white. Wide-eyed in disbelief, they thought they had landed in the tundra, not Toronto.

My family arrived by train through Union Station, where we were welcomed by a happy pack of familiar faces. It was a most wonderful arrival. A cortège of three or four vehicles took us up Yonge Street. I must admit that we were quite taken aback by the city.

There was tremendous anticipation and expectation of the new country among newcomers, most of it quite unrealistic. A story circulated of one immigrant who, upon arrival, chanced on a $10 bill crumpled on the floor. In disgust, he kicked the money to the side. "Do the Canadians expect me to pick this up now? I just arrived!" We expected that success and riches would be waiting for all. Of course, realities were otherwise.

My parents' friends (out of necessity, friends became family, and remain so to this day) deposited us at the door of a duplex. Our apartment was rented and furnished through the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. Furniture meant a mattress and a box spring for each person. My parents also got a headboard, and a mirrored chest of drawers for their room. To eat on, we were also given a Formica table and five vinyl chairs. For my parents, this experience must have been like going camping. Only this tent would be their home for the foreseeable future. Still, we are infinitely grateful to JIAS, for without it, our experience and that of countless of others would have been even more difficult.

That first week was a whirlwind of activity. We had so many things to do – simple things, such as opening a bank account and learning how to navigate the aisles of a supermarket. I recall that the shopping spree, our cart all loaded cost a total of $17.50. How times have changed!

My sister and I were enrolled in school with the guarantee that the English language would be rolling off our tongue within a couple of months. "Preposterous!" we thought. My mother also enrolled in one of those government-sponsored courses for immigrants offering English as a second language.

In that first week, my father found a job with the TD Bank. Applying as an interpreter, he was only asked to demonstrate his verbal and written skills in English and French. When he asked them when he would be tested for the "other languages," they were at a loss. What languages? Well, besides French and English, he was also fluent in Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, and German. He was immediately hired by the bank, which remained his one and only Canadian employer until he retired.

Jewish Life

Tenenbaum's Holocaust memoir

Legacy and Redemption: A Life Renewed* by Joseph E. Tenenbaum, The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (paperbound).

There is an almost unending torrent of books about the Holocaust. Survivors are driven by unrelenting memory and the need to share their story with a world that seems startlingly indifferent and uncomprehending.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This memoir by a well-known Torontonian, a major figure in the business and philanthropic communities, rises above the many. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, through its Survival Memorial Project, chose it to be one of the first three books to be published in its series. More than 900 manuscripts were submitted for selection.

Growing up in the small Polish town of Dzialoszyce, Tenenbaum was carefree and untroubled. He was loved by his parents, embraced by his friends and nurtured by a warm, all-encompassing traditional Jewish holiday and life cycle.

And then the sudden and terrifying change from security to terror, from well-being to horror, as the Nazis occupied the town.

"Father buried our silver candlesticks and other valuables in the earth of the basement floor… Also buried in the basement was the watch Father gave me for my bar mitzvah. American dollars, other currencies, and gold coins were concealed in a brick wall in the attic," Tenenbaum writes. "We hid these things because we were convinced we would eventually return and that everything would be the way it had been in the past."

Tenenbaum survived a number of forced labour camps, as well as the dreaded Austrian concentration camps of Mauthausen, Melk and Ebensee. He lived under a dark cloud in the midst of daily brutality, constant fear and omnipresent death.

"I clearly remember Goeth and his two Doberman pinschers, Ralf and Rolf. Whenever Goeth lusted for blood, he would shoot people in cold blood and then let his two vicious dogs rip them apart. Sometimes the inmates were still alive, and their agony was beyond description.

"We worked to maintain our faith in the Almighty, and we hoped for our liberation. We just wanted to survive another day. Who knew then how many camps, how much forced labor, how many near-death experiences we would have to live through to survive."

Following his liberation in 1945 by a division of the United States army, he participated in the work of Brihah, smuggling Jews across European borders on their way to the Holy Land.

The second half of this engrossing memoir focuses on the author's determination to succeed in the United States and Canada and his desire to support his family and find a recognized place in society. These aims were achieved through difficult years of immigrant experience in 1950s New York and other places.

He brought to his various jobs a number of positive attributes: astuteness, imagination, hard work, a willingness to take risks, resilience and a saving sense of humour. In time, he became a successful entrepreneur in Canada, a leader in construction and housing development.

Among the author's many friends is the author Elie Wiesel, who has written a laudatory introduction to the book. About him Tenenbaum writes, "Elie Wiesel has had a holy obligation to speak on behalf of the victims, survivors who do not speak and children affected by their parents' pain. Wiesel has never hesitated to warn the world about the danger of forgetting or to point a finger at Christian complicity in the Holocaust."

This necessarily brief review cannot do justice to this detailed, many-sided, inspirational life story. What remains with the reader is the author's tenacity, resourcefulness, unswerving hope and Jewish dedication.

Cholent on the web, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The days are short. The nights are cold. And if there is one perfect Jewish food for the season, it is cholent. Since the laws of Shabbat forbid cooking on Saturday, cholent is pre-cooked on Friday, and left to simmer on the stovetop or in the oven overnight. But cholent is far more than just a Shabbat treat. Tucked away in this meaty stew, you'll find clues about Jewish law, history and the migration of Jews around the world.

Eliezer Segal suggests the humble cholent is actually "a sublime expression of Jewish identity." When the Roman satirist Juvenal depicted Jewish poverty, he said Jews only owned "a basket and a box of hay." In fact that "box of hay" is described in the Mishnah and Talmud as a way to insulate cholent on Shabbat. Centuries later, during the Spanish Inquisition, edicts of faith were issued with tips to recognize people who were illicitly observing Jewish traditions. One example, to help spot Conversos, is "cooking on Fridays such food as is required for the Saturday, and on the latter eating the meat thus cooked on the Friday." [http://tinyurl.com/4ym3x]

Cholent was also the centre of a religious controversy. In Cholent: An Historical Perspective, Rabbi Yisrael Rutman explains that in the eighth century, a Jewish sect called the Karaites arose and proclaimed that they followed the Five Books of Moses literally but not the teachings of the Mishnah and the Talmud. That meant that they rejected the rabbinical pronouncement that pre-cooked food may be kept warm on the Sabbath. The Karaites disagreed with that interpretation and spent Sabbath eating cold. No hot cholent for the Karaites. [www.jewishworldreview.com/0301/cholent.asp]

As with most things cholent, there are even disagreements about the origin of the word. Someone at Ohr Somayach's "Ask the Rabbi" section suggested that the name comes from the French "chaudlent" meaning "hot-slow." R. Naftali Falk responded that word "cholent" comes from the Hebrew sh'lahn, meaning "that which stayed overnight." This refers to the fact that cholent stays on the fire Friday night. Whereupon Shimon Goldstein chimed in that cholent obviously comes from the words "shul end," because in many communities people didn't have private stoves, so before Shabbat they all put their cholent in the baker's oven. On Shabbat morning after shul (synagogue services) finished, everyone went to the baker to pick up their cholent. [http://ohr.edu/ask_db/ask_main.php/70/Q2/]

Although we may think of cholent in generic terms (beans, barley, beef, and chicken), the food has evolved as many times as Jews have travelled to new lands. "When the Sephardi Jews of Spain were expelled in 1492, they took with them to Morocco and North Africa the tradition of making hamin… using local ingredients and flavours. Mutton replaced beef, and rice… substituted for barley." Syrian Jews cook their "mixture inside a hollowed-out piece of pumpkin or squash." Throughout the Mediterranean, chickpeas are added and often a raw egg cooked in the dafina overnight. [www.ellenskitchen.com/recipebox/cholent.html]

Sure it's tasty. But can cholent be an obsession? Just ask the members of the Cambridge University Cholent Society. The society, which is "devoted to the consumption of Cholent," includes both recipes and photos of some of their favourite creations. They even share the recipe for Cholent for 900 People. You'll need 50 kilograms diced beef, 50 kilos potatoes, 10 kilos lentils, 5 litres soy sauce, etc. [http://tinyurl.com/4dh8k]

Of course, everyone knows their own cholent is best. A few years ago, 131 hopefuls congregated at the Dan Panorama Hotel in Haifa to vie in the first-ever National Cholent Competition. There was Moroccan schena, Iraqi tbit, Kurdistan hetteh and Yemeni hamin. But the 30 judges chose Esther Israel's Tripolitanian Spinach Cholent, which included chicken, beef, semolina dumplings, stuffed vegetables and spinach, flavoured with garlic, onion and a medley of herbs, including parsley and cilantro. [http://tinyurl.com/6omkm]

"I've fulfilled a dream," said Israel, a 39-year-old mother of three. "I've always wanted many people to eat my cooking, because my children don't appreciate it."

Enough talking already. Next week, we eat.

Israeli humanitarians tour Canadian campuses

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Representatives from Israeli humanitarian groups were in Toronto last week to raise awareness and funds for people in need.

The members of IsraAID, the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, spoke to students at Ryerson University, University of Toronto and York University as part of their cross-Canada tour of university campuses.

IsraAID is a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-governmental organizations (NGOs), as well as other groups based in Israel, that are active in development and relief work.

Dr. Akiva Tamir, chief pediatric cardiologist at the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, Israel, represented the organization Save a Child's Heart (SACH), a group of doctors that provides cardiac care to needy children.

He said SACH has treated more than 1,000 children in Israel since 2001, and its doctors have taken part in 120 operations in 23 different countries.

Palestinian children are the single largest group to receive treatment – 387 to date.

"We find it very rewarding to treat Palestinian children. It's very easy to treat them, because they are very much like us, their culture is not so different. It is easy for them to get to us," Tamir said.

Ma Afrika Tikkun (MAT), another humanitarian organization, was represented by Galit Cohen, who developed and manages a program that helps AIDS orphans.

Dr. Akiva Tamir

While HIV/AIDS in Africa is MAT's main concern, it also focuses on issues related to poverty.

"There are communities that have 80 to 90 per cent unemployment," Cohen said. "They have no running water, no electricity – that kind of poverty."

She cited one community of 1.5 million people that has only one ambulance. It only goes to the hospital, so if someone needs to go to a clinic, they must be transported by wheelbarrow.

"If you can just imagine, if you are sick and bedridden, everything is painful. You're hungry, you're suffering, and someone is taking you in a wheelbarrow for kilometres," she said.

Last to speak was Gal Schwartz, the founder and manager of the environmental and social accountability program at Netafim, the company that introduced drip irrigation to the world.

Schwartz warned the gathering that as the world's population continues to grow, so will the demand for water. Today, only 0.3 per cent of the world's water is usable, and 70 per cent of that goes to agricultural needs, he said.

Netafim is trying to find ways to use this natural resource more efficiently, he said.

"We decided at Netafim that it is not enough for us to donate money. We figure that we should work together with the environment and we should work together with society and do something different, take responsibility," he said.

The IsraAID tour began in Vancouver and ended Jan. 24 at McGill University in Montreal.

"After World War II, many Holocaust survivors came to live in the basement of the Jewish Old Folks Home (Baycrest's forerunner) on Cecil Street. My family was one of them.

Later, I began working at the Home as a nurse. I worked the midnight shift so I could take care of my sons during the day.

The work was often difficult but I loved the patients as well as the other nurses and staff. I felt like they were my family.

I spent more than 25 years at Baycrest. They were some of the best years of my life.

Orthodox lesbian speaks to students at U of T

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

As if the life of an Orthodox Jewish woman in North America isn't complicated enough, "Chani" is also being torn between being true to herself and the religion she honours.

"Chani" – who chose not to reveal her real name – spoke to a gathering last week at the at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life about what it's like to live as an Orthodox lesbian Jew.

The lecture titled "Collision of Worlds and their Rebuilding: On Being an Orthodox Lesbian Jew," organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto's education committee, and Kulanu, the campus gay Jewish organization, covered her journey into accepting herself as both a lesbian and a frum Jew.

"In the beginning of this journey of coming out to myself and realizing who I was, I don't think I questioned my Jewishness or who I was as a Jew. I still knew that I wanted to be observant," Chani said.

Growing up in a very sheltered community in New York City, without television or even a radio, she didn't know what the word lesbian meant.

"I didn't realize that I was different from other people. I just assumed that most girls were attracted to other girls and you get married to guys," she said.

"There were some signs along the way," she joked. "When most of my classmates were babysitting, I was working in a hardware store."

By the time she was 17, she did what all the girls in her class did.

She got married, and by 21 she had three kids.

"Chani" is seen speaking to students

She became overwhelmed with the stress involved in raising children, so her husband, who "was becoming more modern," decided it might be a good idea for them to get a television set.

After watching a few shows, she stumbled across the situation comedy, Ellen, which starred Ellen DeGeneres, who played a lesbian on the show.

"I'm watching this episode and I hear or see the word lesbian and everyone [the studio audience] was laughing, so I thought, 'What does this word mean?' And I looked it up in the dictionary," she said.

"Finding out that I was a lesbian was a relief. It was like, Oh! Now I get it! All of a sudden all those little things make sense!"

Once she had her third child, she felt the relationship she had with her husband had become unreconcilable.

After going into therapy, to try to mend a marriage that was doomed for reasons other than her sexuality, she eventually left and took her children with her.

Leaving her husband was enough to keep her parents from speaking to her ever again – and they don't even know she's gay.

Despite being torn between a religion that doesn't accept her and a lifestyle that doesn't understand her connection to God, Chani has made peace with the fact that it is possible to be Orthodox and gay.

"When people ask me 'Why are you a lesbian? Why are you gay? Why do you feel you need to be different?' It is something you can't explain, it's something innate, something inside of us. The attraction isn't something you decide," she said.

In the same way that Chani couldn't ignore her natural attraction to women, she simply could not abandon her faith in God.

"I knew that I would be throwing away a big part of who I was and I didn't want to do that," she said. "I can't choose not to be frum, I can't choose not to [have] a connection with God."

While she said she still understands that the Orthodox community and the Torah frown upon homosexual acts, there is nothing in the text that says anything about being homosexual.

"Maybe it is easier for me because I'm a woman, and in the Jewish text, the idea of lesbian or gay is not really discussed. The actual wording has to do with a guy lying with a guy."

(The actual passage in Leviticus states: "A man shall not lie with another man as he would lie with a woman, it is an abomination.")

Chani said she dates Jewish women – observant and non-observant – and feels it doesn't make her any less Jewish.

She also said she has come to realize that no Jew is perfect or can live to the letter of the law in every way. That's why she chooses not to judge individuals the way others have judged her.

"I'm going to stop judging Judaism by the Jews… because they are just people. People make mistakes, people mess up everything. If I judged Judaism by the Jews, I wouldn't be a Jew. Let alone Orthodox or observant or any of that," she said.

Chani said she is not out to make anyone believe something they don't want to believe, nor is she looking for approval.

"For me I try to believe that God loves me for who I am regardless of what I do," she said. "I love who I am and I love every part of what makes me be the person I am, and my sexuality is part of that,"

So, what's next for Chani?

She plans to continue taking night courses over the years to get an undergraduate degree, and she's also hoping to do rabbinical studies. She hopes one day that Orthodox rules will be modified so that she can become a rabbi.

Goldstone prosecuted human rights abusers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Richard Goldstone, a former South African Supreme Court judge and a major figure in the investigation of human rights atrocities in Africa and the Balkans, played a role in the establishment of the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague.

Human Rights Symposium

Goldstone, who was the chief prosecutor of the United Nations war crimes tribunals for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia in the mid-1990s, was in Toronto last week to attend and address an international human rights symposium at York University.

In an interview, he acknowledged that the tribunals he headed were instrumental in creating the momentum and support for the creation of the ICC.

The ICC – which complements existing national judicial systems and intervenes when domestic courts cannot or will not investigate or prosecute crimes against humanity – was officially launched on July 1, 2002 after 120 nations voted to adopt the historic Treaty of Rome.

Irwin Cotler, Canada's minister of justice, has described the formation of the ICC as "one of the most dramatic developments" in international criminal law since the end of World War II.

Now 66, Goldstone said that the Rwanda and Yugoslav tribunals proved beyond any reasonable doubt that the international community can deal effectively with war criminals.

But he admitted that these UN bodies initially aroused skepticism. "People seriously questioned whether it could come together and work," said Goldstone, whose married daughter, Nicole (Nicky), lives in Toronto.

Prior to the crises in Rwanda and the Balkans, he added, few observers believed that international humanitarian law could be used as a deterrent against would-be war criminals. "The Rwanda and Yugoslav tribunals changed all that," he said.

Historically, the Nuremberg tribunal, which tried Nazi war criminals in the aftermath of World War II, laid the basis for holding individuals liable for horrific human rights abuses.

"The concept didn't exist before," said Goldstone, noting that the Nuremberg proceedings enshrined the idea that perpetrators of crimes against humanity could be brought to justice.

This gave birth to the concept of "universal jurisdiction," which holds that war criminals can be prosecuted wherever they are found, and that no country should be a haven for torturers and terrorists.

These precedent-setting propositions gained greater currency with the passage of the Genocide Convention by the UN in 1948. But due to the Cold War, they were effectively shelved.

There they lay dormant until 1993, when the UN Security Council unanimously agreed to deal with the massacres in Rwanda and Kosovo.

The Security Council had already rejected eight candidates when Goldstone was hired for the job of chief prosecutor. A graduate of the University of Witwatersrand who had practised corporate law in Johannesburg and had been a judge in the Transvaal provincial division of South Africa's Supreme Court, he was offered the post for two reasons.

"They thought a South African would be acceptable to the Security Council, and I had chaired a commission of inquiry on political violence and intimidation in South Africa."

Asked whether he was chosen because a Jew might be more sensitive to genocide after the Holocaust, he replied, "Not really. All decent people, not just Jews, have some interest in justice."

Working with a staff of 180 from 40 countries, Goldstone gathered an enormous amount of documentary evidence in an attempt to nail the victimizers. "It was dangerous going into many places, especially in the former Yugoslavia," he said.

Before stepping down in 1996, he succeeded in indicting a number of individuals, including Slobodan Milosevic, the president of Serbia.

In his judgment, would-be war criminals in the future will think twice before committing atrocities on that scale.

He finds it tragic that the United States, the sole superpower since the collapse of the Soviet Union, did not vote to adopt the 1998 treaty that established the ICC. (Apart from the United States, six other countries, including Israel, Iraq and China, rejected the treaty). But he is confident that Washington will come on board sooner or later.

Although he hopes that Israel will eventually ratify the treaty and thus join the ICC, he is not sanguine. "That won't happen in the immediate future."

As he sees it, Israel's position stems from its suspicion of the UN, which has a record of condemning Israeli policies. Goldstone's view is that Israel will "fall afoul" of international law as long as it maintains settlements in the territories.

High in demand, he currently sits on a UN committee charged with investigating the scandal-ridden Iraq oil-for-food program.

Some years ago, Goldstone joined an international panel convened by the Argentinian government to monitor the findings of an inquiry on Nazi activities in Argentina since 1938.

A member of the board of Human Rights Watch, he was an opponent of apartheid – the system of institutionalized segregation – even as he served the regime as a judge in the Supreme Court from 1980 to 1990 and in the Constitutional Court from 1994 to 2003.

Through narrow interpretations of the law, he helped blunt "the harsher edges" of apartheid. In one noteworthy case, he set aside an eviction order related to the Group Areas Act, which made it a criminal offence for a person of colour to reside in a neighbourhood that had been designated for whites.

Given his opposition to apartheid, Goldstone had to make one of the most agonizing decisions of his life in accepting a South African judgeship. He took the plunge because non-whites had begun to use the courts in the 1970s to improve their status in society. "I thought I could make a difference."

And so he did, at least to a degree. Today, however, Goldstone wonders whether his presence on the bench did not in fact legitimize apartheid.

Goldstone, the recipient of honorary doctorates of law from the Hebrew University and the University of Calgary, among others, feels the organized Jewish community in South Africa, through the Board of Deputies, could have done far more to protest apartheid.

"Its attitude was that there were many voices in the community and that it could not express a single point of view."

Still, much to the chagrin of South Africa's government, liberal Jewish activists attacked apartheid, he said.

U of T Arab students to hold Israeli Apartheid Week

Program set to run same time as Hillel's Israel Fest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Hillel students at the University of Toronto don't want their annual Israel Fest, a week-long arts and culture program, to be politicized by the university's Arab Students Collective, says Tilly Shames, Hillel's Israel Affairs director.

The Arab Students Collective – representing seven groups including Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and Al-Awda Toronto, the Palestine Right to Return Group – has organized "Israeli Apartheid Week" at the University of Toronto next week, the same week as Hillel's Israel Fest.

"Hillel students want to focus on positive Israel programming through Israel Fest," said Shames. In fact, she noted, they have added extra programs to the event as a result.

"These [anti-Israel] things happen all the time, but as a community we have to choose whether we want to concentrate on the negative or the positive, and we hope the community supports us in that stance," said Johanna Herman, chair of Hillel at the University of Toronto.

Students at Betar-Tagar, the campus wing of Herut-Likud Canada, plan to counter the "Apartheid Week" events by attending the events and portraying Israel in a positive light, said Jonathan Jaffit, president of Betar-Tagar at U of T. "The facts are with us." The students' approach will be one of hadar (dignity) and tagar (tenacity), he said.

"We're saying it's not about free speech. It's about hate speech. They're denigrating one people, the Jewish nation," said Jaffit. "We're here on campus to defend Jews from this type of slander."

The Israeli Apartheid Week was publicized on the listserv of the Institute for Women's Studies and Gender Studies (IWSGS) at U of T, prompting complaints to both the institute and Hillel. Shahrzad Mojab, the institute's director, issued a statement disassociating the institute from the event.

The institute is not sponsoring it and "it has no opinion to offer concerning the views expressed by organizers of the event," she wrote.

Michelle Landy, who specializes in women's studies at the institute and is also interning at Hillel, had written to the institute that while she strongly supports freedom of discourse and debate, "associating the term 'apartheid' with this event only serves to detract from fair academic dialogue and learning about the situation of Israelis and Palestinians." She also expressed concern that the institute's reputation was being "tarnished by a false connection."

The Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD) issued a news release last week condemning the event. "One has to ask why the University of Toronto is hosting an anti-apartheid forum that vilifies a demonstrably non-apartheid state," Alastair Gordon, vice-president of communications for the group, said in the release.

Israel, the release noted, is "the only country in the Middle East where Arabs, Christians and Jews can vote for their representatives in free and open elections with a real choice of candidates. Arabs are full members of the Israeli Knesset (parliament) and sit as judges in the Israeli judiciary, including Abden Rahman Zuabi who is a permanent member of the Israeli Supreme Court… Ironically, Israel is the only Middle Eastern country where women enjoy full and equal rights, the stated mandate of IWSGS."

B'nai Brith Canada met with university officials Friday morning to discuss concerns and ask them to disallow the event. "The university has a moral obligation to help stop the growth of anti-Semitism on campus," said Frank Dimant, the organization's executive vice-president.

Other Jewish organizations have contacted Hillel to offer their assistance, which Shames said is appreciated more.

For external organizations like B'nai Brith and CCD to work independently of the students is "not helpful," she said. "My sense, from what students have told me, is that they understand their campus and are able to work with their faculty and administration, and [other] students without external influence."

Shames said she hopes that students "would feel comfortable coming to Hillel [if they have problems] and if we couldn't handle it, we would connect them with someone who could."

Dylan Rae, vice-president, student life, of U of T's Student Administrative Council (SAC) met with Hillel and said he would do everything he could to "at least move" an event called "Resisting Apartheid: Divestment and the Palestinian Intifada." The Friday event calls for participants to assemble behind Robarts Library for "anti-corporate action."

"My main concern is safety for the students involved," Rae told The CJN. "It's right beside [Hillel's] Wolfond Centre. I don't think that's appropriate. Having seen a lot of these protests, people tend to get worked up."

On Friday, Rae met with a representative of the Student Affairs office, which reports to David Farrar, deputy provost and vice-provost, students.

Last week, Farrar issued a statement that said the university would not cancel Israeli apartheid week because to do so would "violate the university's fundamental commitment to freedom of speech."

He also wrote that any "behaviour or speech that constitutes hatred or incitement to hatred against any group will be dealt with quickly and appropriately."

The administration would be meeting with organizers of the event, Farrar told The CJN Friday afternoon. He indicated that the group's "original proposal," including the location of the Friday rally, could change. His staff had also spoken with Hillel representatives.

"We work with the student groups [that organize events] ahead of time to ensure they understand their responsibilities and to make sure events are safe," he said. He said the university does not believe the bounds of free speech have been exceeded.

What the road map says – and doesn't say

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

After the Jan. 13 suicide bombing at a Gaza border crossing killed six Israeli civilians, the National Post ran a wire service story by Craig Nelson that described the measures Israel was taking to thwart further attacks ("Sharon unleashes army on terrorists," Jan. 17).

Wrote Nelson: "Israel says [newly elected Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud] Abbas must stop attacks by terrorists – some of whom have ties to his own Fatah movement – before it will engage in negotiations and take any steps to set forth the U.S-backed 'road map' peace plan, which both Israel and the Palestinians endorsed in June 2003."

This seems straightforward enough, except that Nelson, like many journalists, missed the essential point: It is the international community (the "Quartet," comprising the European Union, United Nations, the United States and Russia) that has said the Palestinians must disarm and dismantle terrorist groups as the essential first step in implementing the "road map" peace plan. Much of the world, not just Israel, is setting this expectation of the Palestinian leadership.

Thus, the editorial "President for peace" (Guardian Weekly, Jan. 14-20), which said that a "[Palestinian] ceasefire would be a great prize," missed the point by undermining a basic condition for the success of the performance-based road map. A ceasefire (one that would most likely be temporary in any event) is no substitute for the stipulated disarmament.

Abbas may not be able to stop the violence

By contrast, the CJN editorial, "Waiting for Abbas" (Jan. 20), captured the proper sequence: "Abbas has promised the West he will implement the 'road map' peace plan. But without 'dismantling' the terrorists, the first obligation of the road map – not reaching merely a truce with them or securing a ceasefire with them – he shows he is really not intent on doing so."

Similarly, Samuel Segev, writing in the Winnipeg Free Press ("Road map arrives at crossroads," Jan. 18), noted that "dismantling… the terrorist infrastructure is a precondition for the implementation of the road map for Palestinian statehood. Should Abbas prove that he is unable or unwilling to confront the terrorist groups, what should Sharon do?"

Unfortunately, some journalists fail to read or recall the documents that lay out the framework for the resumption of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. This is not merely quibbling over words or trivial details. Knowing what the "road map" actually says is essential to fair and accurate coverage of Israeli-Palestinian issues.

Another person who got it right was Roger Cohen. Writing in the International Herald Tribune ("Globalist: Realism and pessimism, Palestinians and Israelis," Jan. 15), he cited the following assessment by an unnamed Israeli intelligence officer: "The road map is clear. Its path to peace differs from the Oslo accord in one critical respect. Implicit in Oslo was the notion that peace leads to security. The road map says that security comes first, then peace.

"We want to see Abbas arrest and try and sentence to life terms militants who have killed Israelis. This has never happened. We want to see a law saying it is illegal to carry weapons. We know what the dismantlement of Palestinian terror cells is. Until it happens, we must resist pressure to discuss a final status peace. There is a perception that the road to such a peace is now open. But it's not that simple."

As much as Abbas may genuinely wish to stop the violence – a position he has long maintained – it may not be within his power. Segev reported something rarely mentioned in the Western press: "Armed groups [in Gaza] – including members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad – are killing whoever tries to defy them. Last month alone, more than 50 people were killed, some as part of settling accounts and others because they refused to pay 'protection money.'"

Hi-tech touch brings Book of Life to life

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

If there's one lesson Motek Konopny and his younger brother Gregory have learned, it's the importance of tzedakah.

That lesson came from growing up in a house where philanthropy was king. It is also the impetus behind their recent funding of the new, high-tech and interactive Book of Life display, housed in the Lipa Green Building at 4600 Bathurst Street.

The Book of Life – an initiative of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – is an ever-growing archival collection of family stories from community philanthropists whose generosity and vision have left an important legacy to ensure the future of Toronto's Jewish community. Those featured in the book have donated to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto through one of the many investment vehicles available.

Until now, the 68 stories in the original Book of Life were written on beautiful but fragile archival paper. To ensure the future of these important stories, technology was the route to take.

Now, thanks to the new display designed by Alain Cloutier of Ideum Communications, the stories are accessible by a simple touch of the screen. In the near future, the new interactive Book of Life will be accessible on the internet as well.

"We come from a background of charity," says Motek, 32. "We were fortunate to have the opportunity to watch and learn from our parents' contributions. It really made an impression on us. When we heard that there was a chance to help maintain the Book of Life – and to make it accessible to everyone – we knew we had to help."

Motek and Gregory – owners of Canada's Office Supercentre - have also opened an endowment fund at the Jewish Foundation and will be adding their story to the Book of Life this year.

"Once we saw this beautiful big book, and then read a few of the stories in it, we were simply blown away," says Gregory, 29. "My brother and I knew that this book was so important – that it must always be available for their families, and for everybody, to read. The stories are an important education for the entire community. If you don't document history, it tends to be forgotten."

"This new interactive, state-of-the-art display was the perfect way to make these stories accessible to everyone, while preserving the beauty of the original Book of Life," says Carol Kassel. "The generosity and vision displayed by the Konopny brothers, who made this dream a reality, is just remarkable."

"This new interactive display brings the Book of Life to life," says Barbara Bank, who chairs the Book of Life committee with Vicki Campbell. "Now, with a touch, these wonderful stories appear on the screen almost magically."

"As much as endowment-holders enjoy telling their stories, we've found that those passing by the exhibit also enjoy reading them," says Campbell.

Canadian honoured with birthright israel award

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

At an elaborate ceremony in Jerusalem's Knesset, birthright israel presented one of its prestigious Charlie Awards to alumnus Elias Parker, a native of King City (just north of Toronto) and a student at the University of Western Ontario.

The award recognized Parker as one of 12 outstanding birthright israel alumni from around the world, who have shared their passion for Israel in a meaningful way on their campuses or in their local communities through activities organized that influence and inspire as many Jews as possible.

The Charlie Awards are named in memory of Charles Schusterman, a visionary Jewish American philanthropist and one of the founders of birthright israel – a 10-day, free educational trip to Israel for Jews aged 18-26 who have never been on an organized peer trip to the Jewish homeland. Arranged by Schusterman's wife, Lynn, each award has a cash value of $1,800 US and recipients are required to donate the full amount to a Jewish cause of their choice. The awards were first presented in 2004, to eight recipients including Torontonian Johanna Herman.

"I was overwhelmed by the feelings of honour in the room," said Parker, following the January 9 ceremony.

Though appreciative of the award, Parker insists it was not the motivation for his involvement in community following his birthright israel experience organized by Canada Israel Experience (CIE). "I proudly accepted the award knowing that this is not what giving to community is about," he explained. "I love my involvement and contributions but I always feel as if I can do more. An award like this is a major contributor helping me find the motivation I need in order to achieve more of my potential."

Parker grew up in a multicultural family atmosphere but never fully explored his Jewish identity until his trip to Israel. After his return, he actively pursued leadership roles on his university's Israel Action Committee and the executive panel of Hillel, the voice of Jewish students on campus, supported by UJA Federation.

Through his involvement with Hillel, he met his girlfriend Danielle, with whom he volunteers at Ve'ahavta, a Toronto based social service organization and where they are responsible for an annual event to benefit the homeless. He also participated in this past summer's Israel Hasbara Program, organized by National Jewish Campus Life.

Helping Toronto's Jewish poor

Unique JF&CS program assists the disadvantaged

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Approximately 20,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area live below the poverty line and for many of them, the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) Supplementary Financial Assistance Program (SFAP) plays a vital role in helping them to maintain a Jewish lifestyle.

The program provides direct financial assistance to Toronto's Jewish poor for housing, food and other needs.

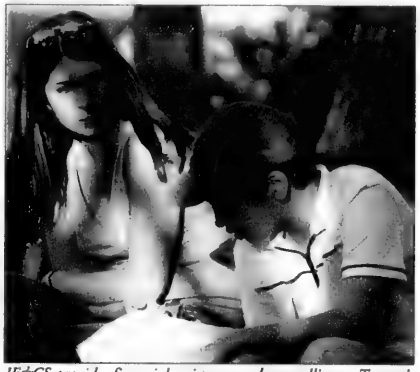
In the coming year, UJA Federation will allocate $2.3 million in direct financial assistance to help the poor through SFAP - $160,000 more than last year.

According to a UJA Federation demographic study based on the 2001 census, there are more economically disadvantaged Jews residing in Toronto than in any other Jewish community in Canada. Toronto is home to 40 per cent of the total Jewish poor in this country.

"We have approximately 550 to 600 clients on our on-going case load, and for many of them, without this funding, their lives would be affected in a hugely detrimental way," said Ron Levine, executive director, JF&CS. "We're able to provide them with transportation, housing, food and clothing – the basic necessities. However, while we provide them with financial assistance, our efforts don't end with financial assistance. We help people as much as possible to live up to their potential."

The Supplementary Financial Assistance Program offers rent subsidies so the Jewish poor can remain in Jewish areas. It also serves as a means of engagement by JF&CS with those who are in the worst economic straits.

"Our program is unique in North America because of the range of services offered to our clients, in addition to the financial component," said Levine. "Every family who comes in for financial assistance is assessed for its specific needs, and they are then referred to a special program to optimize their quality of life and improve their situation."



JF&CS provides financial assistance and counselling to Toronto's Jewish poor.

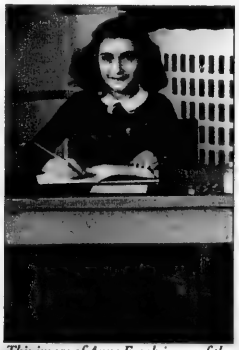
"First and foremost, tzedakah is a key element - and obligation - of being Jewish," said Keith Ray, UJA Federation's chair of social planning and allocations. "Allocating these funds to help our fellow Jews in need is a part of that obligation. Toronto is a large and relatively wealthy Jewish community and I believe that it is incumbent upon the more fortunate to help those who require assistance."

Anne Frank: a private photo album

New exhibit debuts in Toronto next month

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Anne Frank is one of the most recognized names associated with the Holocaust. Still, many people fail to realize that before Anne and her family went into hiding, before all but her father died at the hands of the Nazis, and before the discovery of the journal she kept so diligently, the Frank family lived a life like most middle class Jewish families in Europe.



This image of Anne Frank is one of the photos featured in the exhibit.

Anne Frank: A Private Photo Album – an exhibit of 70 never-before-seen photographs taken by Otto Frank of his family and friends between 1926 and 1941 - is coming to First Canadian Place, in the heart of Toronto's downtown district. The exhibit, presented by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, February 20 - March 18, will show this period in the Frank's life and shed a new perspective on the girl whose name and diary became world renowned.

"An exhibition like this reminds us that this child, who really was so articulate and so wise and whose life was snuffed out in such a tragic way, had such a wonderful childhood just like you and me," says Lorraine Sandler, Chair of The Holocaust Centre.

Dr. Irving Gottesman, who is co-chairing the exhibit with Rosanne Ain, stresses the importance of the exhibit's location. "The high-traffic area will allow for a tremendous number of people to view the images, particularly non-Jews," he says.

Ain says the exhibit, that is making its Canadian debut, is especially significant not only for its fresh perspective on the life of Anne Frank, but also "how it coincides with this year, which marks 60 years since the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps. The generation of survivors is aging and dying off and we really have to keep their memories alive."

The Holocaust Centre, says Sandler, is attempting to profile many Holocaust stories and events in order to promote the centre as a unique and wonderful place in the city, before it undergoes extensive redevelopment over the next few years. "We're looking to put the centre in the city's visiting profile; a special destination for students and for visitors not only to learn about the Holocaust but for lessons in understanding diversity. This exhibit is part of that thrust," she adds.

Volunteer docents are needed to guide school and adult groups. If you are interested in volunteering, please contact Hannah Schwartz at The Holocaust Centre of Toronto to arrange an interview. 416-635-2883 ext. 153 or e-mail: hschwartz@ujafed.org. Admission to the exhibit is free.

Speaking out

This week's editorial focuses on the World Jewish Congress plenary that took place in Brussels, Belgium

WJC: The Knesset of the Jewish Diaspora

By BERNIE M. FARBER,
National Chief Executive Officer,
Canadian Jewish Congress

Wherever you find an organized Jewish community, you'll find representatives of the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

The WJC was created to address the interests and needs of Jews and Jewish communities around the world. It acts as a Jewish Knesset for the Diaspora at a time when issues affecting Jews worldwide require thoughtful discussion and, when need be, universal action.

From January 8 to 10, I was privileged to be part of the Canadian Jewish Congress delegation at the WJC plenary session in Brussels. Our group, which was led by Moshe Ronen, CJC's Chair of the Governing Board, included CJCONT Vice Chair Hershel Sahian and CJC representatives Michael Ostroff and Nathaniel Green.

During the course of the two-day plenary, one issue became glaringly clear - that Israel continues to be a target, and those who support her find themselves in a war of public misinformation waged by the political left and right, as well as by Islamists and others. Sadly, the anti-Israel rhetoric has morphed into vile antisemitism.

The key battleground for this war is common to all - the college campus. Yet it is here where Canada shines. Thanks to a decision by Canadian Jewish community leaders and through the newly established Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), the newly established National Jewish Campus Life (NCJL) is working with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other federations who, together, with the UJA Federation-supported Hillel - the voice of Jewish students on campus - fight this battle. WJC delegates from around the world were intrigued by Canadian Jewry's work on campus, and CJC will assist other communities on this issue in any way it can.

While Canada is not the largest delegation at the WJC, we are influential. Plenary elections saw Edgar Bronfman re-elected as President of WJC, and Moshe Ronen was elected as one of its Vice Presidents. CJC National President Ed Morgan also serves on the governing council. And for the first time, the North American division of WJC will hold its annual gathering in Toronto in April.

UTT firebomber gets 40 months for 'terrorist act'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A Quebec judge said he was sending a clear message that terrorism, especially when connected to international events, cannot be tolerated in this country in sentencing Sleiman El-Merhebi, 19, to a 40-month prison term.

El-Merhebi, who pleaded guilty in December to firebombing the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs (UTT) last April, will serve two years in a federal penitentiary because his eight months in custody since his arrest count as double time.

UTT officials, however, said the sentence was not severe enough. B'nai Brith Canada also felt El-Merhebi should do more time, but Canadian Jewish Congress described the sentence as "very fair."

Judge Jean Sirois said he was invoking sections of the Criminal Code that allow for terrorism and hate motivation to be considered aggravating factors in sentencing.

He described the arson as a premeditated "act of terrorism motivated by vengeance, hate and prejudice against a cultural community," all the more grave because it targeted children.

"There is a distinction to make between vandalism and terrorism: one aims to destroy stupidly, the other to intimidate, to sow terror for a political goal. Terrorism is much more threatening for a society: it attacks its foundations."

Sirois said there was no question that El-Merhebi's goal was to intimidate the Jewish community. At least $600,000 in material damage was caused by a Molotov cocktail using six cans of kerosene.

Sirois stressed the "trauma" suffered not only by those associated with the elementary Jewish day school, but by the Jewish community of Canada. Indeed, the entire country, including the Muslim community, was "shaken" by the incident and massively expressed its solidarity with the Jewish community.

The targeting of a Jewish school and the note posted at the scene of the crime, signed by "Les Brigades du Cheick Ahmed Yasine," left no doubt that El-Merhebi's intention was to blame Montreal Jews for Israel's actions, he said. Even more troubling, Sirois added, was that the note threatened that retaliation against the community would be even worse if Israel's "crimes" continue.

Sirois said there is no evidence that El-Merhebi, a Lebanese-born Muslim who has lived here since 1992, is connected to any racist or terrorist organization, and appears to otherwise have little interest in current events. He also noted that the teen is not religious and is "well-integrated into Quebec society."

Sirois found that the "amateurism" that characterized the crime, suggests it was not directed by a larger organization. El-Merhebi appeared to give little thought to covering his tracks, notably being caught on videotape buying the kerosene, a brand sold exclusively at Canadian Tire. In a wiretapped telephone call with a friend in May, he boasted that he had committed the arson, and described how he planned it.

Sirois observed that in that conversation El-Merhebi called what he did an act of terrorism, not vandalism, expressed regret only for having left evidence, and his only concern was how he could evade arrest, possibly by leaving the country.

Sirois said he did not give a stiffer sentence – the maximum penalty for arson is 14 years – because of El-Merhebi's age (18 at the time), his lack of a criminal record, evidence that this was an "isolated incident" not in keeping with his past character, and a testimony from a psychiatrist that El-Merhebi is not dangerous, and that the probable explanation was that he acted emotionally due to his "impulsivity and irresponsibility."

Sirois said he was also prepared to give the accused "the benefit of the doubt" as to the sincerity of the written apology and remorse he submitted to the court. El-Merhebi asked for the "pardon" of the Jewish community and particularly of the UTT students. He also asked the forgiveness of his own community.

He could not explain why he did what he did, except that he was upset when he learned of the death of Yasine, the Hamas spiritual leader, on television.

El-Merhebi, dressed in a grey suit and tie, his hair close-cropped, showed no emotion when he heard his sentence in the packed courtroom.

Crown prosecutor Anne Aubé, who had asked for a minimum two-year prison term beyond El-Merhebi's time in detention, said she was satisfied with Sirois's decision, saying it demonstrates that terrorist acts cannot be tolerated by Canadian society. El-Merhebi's lawyer, Pierre Poupart, had asked for a sentence of two years, less a day, served in the community.

UTT issued a brief written statement applauding Sirois's "insight and sensitivity."

"Given the gravity of this premeditated attack and the resulting devastating effect on our community in particular and on Canadians in general, we had hoped for a more severe sentence.

"Nevertheless, with judgment now having been rendered, we look forward to resuming normal school life and to putting this unfortunate chapter of our history behind us," said director-general Sidney Benudiz and president Rachel Cohen. The school had no representatives at the sentencing.

Theoretically, El-Merhebi will be eligible for parole after serving one-sixth of 24 months, but, under the circumstances, would likely not be considered until he's served a third of his sentence. He must be released after two-thirds, or 16 months.

El-Merhebi's mother, Rouba Fahd El-Merhebi, who is charged with being an accessory after the fact, is due to be sentenced in March.

School funding opposed

Although they occurred before he was born, Yetnikoff has an uncomfortable sense of "deja vu" that what happened last week is reminiscent of the bitter debates in the 1920s and 1930s over the place of Jewish children in Quebec's school system.

"I'm just happy there were not demonstrations in the streets like there were back then."

Even Marcus Tabachnick, who is against state funding of private education and in favour of a neutral system, feels wounded as a Jew. Tabachnick is president of the Lester B. Pearson School Board, the other school board the Jewish schools are associated with.

"I'm 55 and I have never faced what I did in the past week. I'm also probably the only Jewish president of a public school board in Canada, but I've never felt uncomfortable or unwelcome until now. The whole thing has soured me.

"This is not 1935, it's 2005. We should have gone beyond that… If this had been another group's schools, would we have had the same debate?"

In November, Pearson board commissioners unanimously approved Reid's proposal that the board enter into an association with Jewish schools, Tabachnick said.

Whether the contracts with Hebrew Academy and Hebrew Foundation School will be honoured until the end of the school year is now in doubt. "We will talk with the two schools in the coming days to see if we should pursue the program or not [until June]," he said.

Tabachnick said the board went along with the government's plan because its "mission" is to foster intercultural harmony and is already doing so with other communities on an "ad hoc basis".

The amount – up to $10 million – that would have gone into associate status was not coming out of the budget for public education, and 10 per cent of the amount that would have gone to the boards represented money they would not have received otherwise, he said.

Tabachnick thinks the controversy has moved the issue of government funding of any private schools to "the front burner," which is not something the Jewish community wanted.

Taking a different view, Beryl Wajsman, president of the Institute for Public Affairs of Montreal, thinks the community should not assume anti-Semitism underlies the massive reaction against the funding. Wajsman, the son of Holocaust survivors, said this episode points to the need for Jews to become more engaged in public life in Quebec if they want people to understand them.

Camp BB-Riback - An Experience of a Lifetime & A Celebration of our 50th Anniversary!

Camp BB-Riback is the summer experience of a lifetime and we have been providing a magical Jewish experience for all children grades 1-10 for the last 50 years. Summer 2005 marks Camp BB-Ribacks 50th Anniversary and we couldn't be more excited!

The preparations and planning for our 50th Anniversary and Alumni Reunion are underway for June 24-26, 2005. It will be an unbelievable opportunity to relive special moments, create new memories, and celebrate the next 50 years! Everyone will get the chance to enjoy the classic Shabbat brisket and potatoes dinner to the exciting specialty areas, to a tasty Sunday brunch. Visit our website for registration information for this celebration!

As always, our amazing summer programs are geared for all children grades 1-10 to provide an unforgettable summer experience along the shores of Pine Lake, Alberta. The health and happiness of your children is our first priority and with the multitude of activities and innovative programming, they will not only thoroughly enjoy themselves but they will make lifelong friends, and treasured memories. The magical tradition of Camp BB-Riback is enhanced every summer by a wave of enthusiasm and creativity from young Jewish staff and campers. The combination of tradition and innovation gives Jewish youth the opportunity to experience a "lifelong sense of belonging".

Our programs incorporate a Jewish theme and accommodate all children starting at those finishing the first grade. The youngest campers (Grades 1-3) have the option of staying one week where they instantly fall in love with Camp BB – Riback. As they move to be full session campers (Grades 3-6) they are entranced and entertained. Our older age groups including, Machon (Grades 7 & 8), Leadership Training (Grade 9), and Counselor in Training (Grade 10) deals with social skills, intense leadership training, and responsible staff training. All age groups enjoy the plethora of activities that we offer ranging from horseback riding, a climbing wall, waterskiing, and pottery.

Don't delay any longer. Registration is still available but the spots will fill up quickly. All of the important information regarding summer 2005 registration and the 50th Anniversary and Alumni Reunion is posted on our website at www.campbb.com We look forward to celebrating with you!

Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its 13th fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, there is no busing throughout the day as all activities are held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two week session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

Par Golf Camps is offering weekend junior programs beginning in May. Call us for more information.

For more information on any of our programs, please visit our website at www.learngolf.com or call us at telephone (416) 960-GOLF (4653).

Welcome to Human Moves Day Camp

Last summer Frank's Swim School operated a day camp at Glenview Senior Public School at Lawrence Ave and Avenue Road . Campers enjoyed a wide range of a specialty and core programs and benefited from daily on-site swimming lessons.

This summer, we offer the following specialty programs: Ages 4-12: Dance, Karate and Multi-sports. Ages 7-12: Action Sports (skateboarding and inline skating), Badminton, Soccer, Baseball, Basketball, Volleyball. Ages 10-16: Scuba. Ages 13-16: Counselor in Training programs, Leadership development.

Human Moves Day Camp is based on the concept that the development of fundamental skills and strategies will help children feel competent when participating in a wide range of sports and general athletic activities. We firmly believe in a balanced program.

In addition to sports specialties, we ensure campers are exposed to games, nature hikes, visual and performing arts as well as science and technology projects.

The camp receives guidance from a local parent advisory group in an effort to continually enhance the camp and to meet the community's needs. To be a part of this dynamic group, please send an email to info@humanmovesdaycamp.com.

Future stars baseball and sports camp

At Future Stars, our objective is to ensure the happiness of all our players through their baseball and camping experience. We believe in emphasizing the development of the player through spirit, mind and body, while providing the best modern baseball equipment, facilities and first-rate instruction.

We offer a variety of baseball programs for boys and girls 5 to 14 years of age. We offer a diversified program, which accommodates both the beginner and advanced skill level player. We compliment our instruction with daily live game action for all players.

Future Stars offers individually tailored instructional programs for Rep, Select and House League teams.

Our facilities and equipment include a multi diamond baseball complex, batting cages, pitching machines, radar gun, individual pitching and hitting stations, an indoor swimming pool, a full field soccer pitch, a beach volleyball court to accommodate other sports activities and a pro shop with the latest in baseball and sports equipment.

We offer bus transportation that is included in our fees. All buses are supervised and all routes are planned for as little travel time as possible.

Our fees also include a Camp T-shirt and Hat as well as a juice at lunch and a snack at the end of the day.

The Future Stars Baseball And Sports Camp also offers special programs such as field trips to watch the Toronto Blue Jay's as well as out of town excursions to see the Detroit Tigers and a visit to the baseball hall of fame in Cooperstown N.Y.

Hashomer Hatzair / Camp Shomria

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer camp experience for youths 8-16 from Canada, the U.S., and around the world. A variety of challenging sports, theme days, educational and cultural activities create an atmosphere designed to build life-long friendships. It's located on Otty Lake, a beautiful waterfront, ideal for a wide selection of fun-filled water activities.

Camp Shomria promotes deep love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It's run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, established over 80 yrs. ago, and is active within the Jewish community. There are weekly activities available throughout the school year in Toronto and a 6-day residential winter camp during December. A special one-week introductory camping experience is offered to campers in grades 2 and 3. Activities include dance, arts & crafts, a dynamic drama program, hikes, trips and a rope course (see directory). Grade 10 graduates participate in a leadership training program, "Yedid Plus", which includes an intensive 5 wk. itinerary in Israel.

Staff are dedicated and committed. Most were Shomria campers. Camp Shomria has a full-time registered nurse on site. Health and safety is our top priority. OCA standards of excellence are met and often exceeded. To learn more about Camp Shomria, please call Itai or Miriam at 416-736-1339.

Camp Shalom - Capture the Spirit!

Camp Shalom, on beautiful Lake Muskoka, is getting ready to present its 57th camping season and invites your children, ages 8 to 13, to be part of our exceptional summer program under the skillful, dedicated care of our leaders and counsellors.

The camp features an individualized program wherein each camper is free to choose from over 18 daily activities, including canoe, sailing, waterskiing, daily instructional swim, kayaking, drama, arts & crafts, music, photography, cooking, ropes and rock climbing, gymnastics, dance and landsports such as tennis, basketball, beach volleyball, football and soccer. Campers learn excellent life skills in our tripping and survival programs, and sharing and fair play in interpersonal relationships.

Owned and operated by the Toronto Zionist Council, Shalom is recognized as an outstanding Zionist camp for Jewish children and is proud of our high standards in having achieved this recognition. Camp Shalom is Shabat-observant, maintains a glatt Kosher kitchen and a nut-sensitive environment and is accredited by the Ontario Camping Association.

We offer two full summer sessions or a 10-day Sneak Preview option in August 2005 for first-time campers. Have your children join our family for a fun-filled summer and "Capture the Spirit" of Shalom!

Camp Moshava Canada – Camping above all the rest!

Camp Moshava Canada, the only Orthodox, Zionist, Bnei Akiva camp in Canada, is situated on 250 acres of beachfront property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

At Camp Moshava, no matter one's requirements, all campers' dietary needs are met with tasty and nutritious meals. Our 2nd service salad bar is extremely popular with the campers.

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and an outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre (Matnas) featuring regulation size basketball, volleyball and floor hockey courts as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, biking, and a ball hockey rink.

Moshava has a 2-week "splash of camp" (Nitzanim) program designed for grade 2 graduates. The camp's regularly scheduled days include informal Jewish education, instructional swimming in an outdoor heated pool, canoeing, water-skiing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips and chesed program.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere and camaraderie that exists amongst staff and campers is truly special. Only those who have actually encountered a Shabbat at Camp Moshava Canada can truly appreciate what the experience is like! Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience, it's an experience of a lifetime!

CAMP GEORGE, AN ALL-ROUND CAMP

Do you want to send your child to a good all-round overnight camp this summer? Call Camp George.

Located in Parry Sound, Camp George is in its seventh year. It's co-ed, for Grades 2 through 10 -- one of 12 camps run by the Union for Reform Judaism, and the only one in Canada.

"Ontario's camping tradition goes back more than a century," says Senior Assistant Director Karen Kollins. "Camp George blends Judaism with this tradition, and with the best of contemporary camping and learning."

Camp George offers a plethora of opportunities to learn by doing, to develop skills through activity. There's a full range of arts, sports, and Jewish cultural programs.

Camp George also promotes community involvement, friendship, cooperation and independence. Sharing space, meals and facilities, children learn give and take, and how to "pull their weight" in a group. And friendships made at camp often last for life.

"While Camp George is part of Reform," says Kollins, "we also belong to the larger Jewish community, and teach traditional texts and prayers. We have some staff from Israel, and feature Israeli cultural programs.

"We're part of the greater community, too," Kollins continues. "In one recent tzedakah project, campers knitted mitts for the homeless."

The arts include drama, musical theatre, pottery, arts and crafts, multimedia and modern dance. "With cutbacks in the schools," says Kollins, "we're taking up the torch."

There's lots of variety in sports too. There's a full waterfront program, with swimming, sailing, water skiing, canoe, wakeboard and kayak. The climbing program includes high ropes, climbing wall and giant swing.

Many of the activities enhance the campers' awareness of their role in nature. Camp George organizes day and overnight hikes, as well as canoe trips into Algonquin and other parks. In the Teva program, campers can participate in activities such as organic gardening.

There are two 3 1/2-week sessions every summer, for 300 kids in each; and for first-time campers in Grades 2 through 5, there is a 12-day Wonder Weeks session. Camp George's younger units still have a lot of space. Don't delay, though: call 416-638-2635 now; or visit Camp George's website at http://www.campgeorge.org

CAMP EXPERTS & TEEN SUMMERS

How great it is when kid and camp match up! If your child, say, an outdoor sports enthusiast, goes to the right camp, they'll bring back memories that sustain him through a long winter when playing fields are deep in snow. But the wrong place, where sports are an afterthought, could sour him on camps for good.

It's vital to make the right match -- whether it's sports or science, art or computers that turn your son or daughter on. For kids 7 - 18, call The Camp Experts & Teen Summers. They visit and research about 150 camps a year, of all different kinds, and can give you the best advice. Their world-wide research includes over 800 programs, internships, community service, and language program, adventure & so much more.

"Camps extend the learning process," says Joanne Paltrowitz, the owner/ director of The Camp Experts. "They enable children to get better at things they like, and learn independence and co-operation, while enjoying themselves in a relaxed atmosphere.

"We have many repeat clientele," says Paltrowitz. "We love what we do, and tailor our recommendations to individual children and parents." The service is free.

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 26 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

SO HOW DO YOU CHOOSE A CAMP?

After reviewing the written material and talking to the camp staff, you begin developing an impression of what the camp is like and how it is run.

ASK YOURSELF:

"Do I have trust and confidence in this camp?" "Will my child be safe, have fun, make friends, be happy and be nurtured?" "Will I feel comfortable approaching the camp staff during the summer if an issue arises?"

If the answer is yes, then you have found the right camp!

חֲרִי הָאוּם

קלינט איסטווד-סרט חובה

קלינט איסטווד עומד מאחרי סרט חדש-A Million Dollar Baby, סרט שבו הוא שובר את כל השיאים: הוא כתב את התסריט, הוא ביים, הוא כתב את המוסיקה והוא גם השתקן הראשי. והתוצאה עשר.

טעות החשבון של שרון

No charges laid against paper for promoting hatred

VANCOUVER — A small Muslim newspaper that claimed Jews are responsible for a host of social ills, as well as both world wars and the 9/11 attacks, will not be prosecuted for promoting hatred.

The RCMP Hate Crimes unit in Surrey, B.C. announced last week that after a year-long probe of The Miracle, the Crown would not be laying charges.

The case "did not meet our standards" for charges to be laid, said Stan Lowe, spokesman for the B.C. Criminal Justice Branch.

While the subject matter did constitute hate literature, the Crown was unable to prove that the newspaper intended to promote hatred, Lowe added.

The article in question, published in December 2003 and written by Idaho-based Holocaust denier Edgar Steele, blamed Jews for a total of 81 items, ranging from pedophilia and organized crime to "race-mixing," militant feminism, and "forcing us to allow homosexuals to lead Boy Scout troops.

"It isn't Arabs lying about and guilt-tripping us with 'the Holocaust' – it is Jews," the article read. "It wasn't Arabs who caused the Great Depression – it was Jews. It wasn't Arabs who started World War I – it was Jews. It wasn't Arabs who started World War II – it was Jews."

Copies of the paper were turned over to hate crimes authorities by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region.

At the time, the Delta, B.C.-based paper's editor, Nusrat Hussain, had said he had no regrets about publishing the rant.

"We try to keep freedom of speech and not necessarily that we agree with the article, and that is what Canada is about," he said at the time the probe was launched.

Last week, however, Hussain said he regretted running the article.

"I shouldn't have published it," he was quoted as saying. "That was a bad choice. But at the same time, I always believed that if somebody is saying something wrong, let it come out and let us deal with that person."

In a front-page editorial in the latest edition, Hussain wrote that he "would like to thank Almighty Allah for establishing us innocent contrary to the false allegations of spreading hate."

In a statement, CJC region chair Mark Weintraub said he "fully appreciates" circumstances in which a publication might be hate-filled yet not meet the standards of prosecution.

He said Congress will continue its "zero tolerance" approach in monitoring hatred.

As a result of the investigation, several advertisements from provincial and federal politicians were pulled from the newspaper, which has a circulation of around 2,500.

As well, the paper was forced to scale back from publishing weekly, to twice monthly.

CJC names new officers

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has been appointed CJC's national chief executive officer.

In that capacity, he will oversee all of CJC's operations.

As well, Manuel Prutschi, currently national director of community relations, has been named CJC's national executive vice-president.

The appointments were announced last week by CJC national president Ed Morgan.

Farber, to be based in Toronto, will provide and execute "strategic leadership and set its management style [and be] responsible for administration and governance," Morgan said in a statement.

Farber "will ensure the carrying out of CJC's mandate. He will plan, set and implement the organization's objectives, priorities, and policies and communicate them to the Jewish and general publics."

Farber has been with CJC since 1984.

Prutschi will serve as CJC's overall advisor and act as a resource to the lay and professional leadership.

"He will focus on the development and formulation of policy and new advocacy initiatives as well as on identifying emergent or future issues," Morgan stated.

He will also have special responsibility for inter-group and international relations, research, policy statements and publications and work with legal counsel on court and quasi-judicial interventions.

Prutschi has served for the past year as CJC's acting national executive director. He joined CJC in 1984.

Program unites Israeli, Canadian musicians

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The director of the School of Music at the University of Manitoba has been trying to get an exchange program of Israeli and Canadian musicians, university music teachers and music students off the ground.

In an interview from Israel, Dale Lonis said his proposal for an "Israel-Canada Musical and Cultural Alliance" has been greeted with enthusiasm by staff of the music faculties at McGill, York, the University of Toronto and the University of Manitoba, as well as in Israel.

Lonis was recently a guest artist and conductor-in-residence at the Jerusalem Music Centre under the fledgling program. He and four of his U of M faculty members arrived in Israel in December for a month of teaching master classes and performing with Israeli musicians, culminating in a special concert with the Israel Philharmonic in mid-January.

During his visit, Lonis met with the director of the Tel Aviv School of Music and representatives of the Jewish Music Academy at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"This project will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars," Lonis says. "But we have a number of cultural groups as well as Manitoba alumni and foundations in Israel that want to support this."

The Rothschild Foundation, he reports, provided funding for this visit to Israel.

"Both the president of the University of Manitoba [Emoke Szathmary] and the Israeli consul general [Ya'cov (Cobie) Brosh] in Canada are very excited about this program," Lonis says.

Originally from Chicago, Lonis has been director of the University of Manitoba School of Music for the past four years. His relationship with Israel goes back much further. He describes Israel as his "favourite place on earth."

He first visited there more than 20 years ago, when he was chosen from 150 applicants to be guest conductor at a national music camp in Israel. "I was fortunate to be able to come to Israel as a young musician," he says. "It was a wonderful opportunity to work with great musicians from all the major orchestras in Israel. And that led to other great things for me musically throughout Europe and South America."

Lonis has been back many times as guest conductor for the Israeli Philharmonic Choir and orchestras throughout the country, and has forged enduring friendships with many Israeli musicians.

Two years ago, Lonis arranged for Rami Oren, the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra's associate principal trumpet player, and his violist wife, Jenia, to come to U of M to teach.

"That gave me the germ of this idea," Lonis says. "Israel gets so much negative publicity in the media. I saw an opportunity to use music as means of creating a dialogue between Israelis and Canadians, as well as showcase one of our strengths in Canada."

The exchange program would bring Israeli musicians to Canada and Canadian musicians to Israel, so they could teach and interact with one another.

Lonis' proposal goes a step beyond that though. Along with music faculty members from Israeli and Canadian universities and music students at the university level, younger music students from elementary school upward would be able to participate.

The next stage of the exchange program is a visit by three members of the Israeli Philharmonic to Winnipeg in February.

SONG AND DANCE: Grade 1 students from the Toronto Heschel School recently visited the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and entertained the seniors who attend the day program there with song and dance.

Cabinet praises quiet in Gaza, but warns it is fragile

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon warned Sunday that the quiet in the Gaza Strip at the end of last week was fragile and that there were still elements, in Syria and Hezbollah in particular, that would try to heat things up there.

Speaking at the cabinet meeting, which was held under tight security in Sderot as a mark of solidarity with the residents of the Negev town, Ya'alon said the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) was monitoring these elements.

Ya'alon said the quiet was not a hudna (ceasefire), but a practical cessation of operations on the part of the terror groups. He said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had pushed for this understanding with the terror groups.

Ya'alon stressed that the terrorist attack at the Karni crossing on Jan. 13 sparked much anger among the Palestinian public toward the terrorist organizations, and noted that Abbas had taken punitive measures against a number of PA security officers who had allowed the truck used in the attack to pass through the crossing.

Ya'alon noted, nevertheless, that the recent quiet in Gaza was absolute and had not been seen in the area for a long time. He reported that in view of last week's calm, the IDF decided to open the Sufa crossing for the passage of humanitarian goods and aid.

> The recent quiet ... had not been seen in the area for a long time

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said he hopes the quiet will continue, but warned that if it does not, "the IDF and security forces will continue to do all that is required to remove the threat hanging over the residents here."

Commenting on criticism that the government was not giving the IDF a free hand to deal with the Qassam and mortar attacks, Sharon said, "I have heard the criticism on a number of occasions and I want to say that even if things aren't always done in public, we do not cease to act on behalf of the residents here.

"I am a neighbour of Sderot," he continued. "I frequently hear sounds of explosions and I know how difficult and frustrating it is to live like this in Sderot, Nir Am, Sa'ad, Gush Katif and anywhere that is under this attack."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz expressed hope that the positive signs coming from the Palestinians will continue. Asked about goodwill gestures on the part of Israel, Mofaz said that when dialogue with the Palestinians starts, Israel will consider what steps it can take.

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres praised Abbas, noting that "he is a serious man who is demonstrating goodwill and is consistent in his moves."

The cabinet meeting was also attended by Sderot Mayor Eli Moyal and the heads of the neighbouring local councils.

Meanwhile, Palestinian sources said Sunday that the Palestinian factions would only agree to a ceasefire in return for clearly stated Israeli intention to address a number of issues, including a withdrawal of Israeli forces from Palestinian cities in the West Bank and an end to IDF operations in these cities, the release of prisoners as a goodwill gesture, an end to the targeted killings and house demolitions, and clear arrangements concerning the fate of wanted men from all the organizations.

The sources said the Palestinian factions had agreed to maintain calm over the coming weeks, but added that the agreements could not be regarded as a done deal.

For its part, the IDF is impressed by the action taken by the PA to prevent terror attacks in the Gaza Strip in recent days. Senior military sources stressed nevertheless that the PA's true test would begin Monday, with the end of the Id al-Adha festival.

Banks hold Shoah funds

A Knesset committee slammed Israeli banks last week for "severe negligence" in handling accounts totalling some NIS 1 billion of thousands of Jews who died in the Holocaust. Shoah victims deposited the cash in some 9,000 accounts, the committee said in a report. "There wasn't a deliberate system of concealing funds, but there was without a doubt negligence in keeping the documents, foot-dragging, obtuseness and ignoring the heirs," committee chair Colette Avital said. The report said the banks will have to return about a third of the money to victims' heirs, if they are traced. The state must return the rest, because the banks transferred most of the funds to the British Mandate and state in the 1940s and '50s.

Canadian tourism up

Tourism from Canada increased 34 per cent last year over 2003, with 43,000 tourists visiting Israel in 2004. Overall, 1,497,800 tourists travelled to Israel last year, up 41 per cent over 2003. Some 378,000 Americans came to Israel in 2004, the largest single group. France was second overall with 256,000 tourists, the most ever. "There is a definite confidence returning to Canadian tourists travelling to Israel. People want to see the beauty of the country, re-connect with holy sites and experience what Israel has to offer," said Dani Shahal, head of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada.

Canada, Israel hold talks

The annual political dialogue between Israel and Canada took place last week at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Jerusalem. On the agenda were bilateral relations, regional and international matters, the war against terror and strategic threats. Senior representatives from the Canadian embassy, including Ambassador Donald Sinclair, attended. "The bilateral relations between the countries and the dialogue are characterized by warmth and friendship, at every level," Israel's Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

Wounded Sderot girl dies

A teenaged girl who shielded her brother from a rocket attack in Sderot has died of her wounds. Ella Abuksis, 17, died Friday at a Be'er Sheva hospital. She threw herself on top of her brother Tamir, 10, when a rocket launched from Gaza landed in the southern Israel city. He also suffered shrapnel wounds in the Jan. 15 attack.

Cdn. buys Israeli bank

A consortium headed by Matthew Bronfman will buy a controlling interest in the Israel Discount Bank. Bronfman, a scion of the philanthropic Canadian family agreed to pay NIS 1.3 billion for the Israeli government's 26 per cent stake in the bank.

No missile deal during Assad visit: Putin

By ALUF BENN
and YAIR ETTINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Russian President Vladimir Putin promised Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a phone conversation last week that he would not close the deal to sell shoulder-launched missiles to Syrian President Bashar Assad during the latter's visit to Moscow, which began on Monday.

Sharon told Putin that Israel was concerned that the advanced SA-18 missiles, which have a range covering the entire State of Israel, could find their way to Hezbollah and even to Palestinian terror organizations.

Israel's request from Russia not to sell the missiles to Syria has raised the level of tension between Moscow and Jerusalem in recent weeks. Moscow and Damascus have repeatedly denied reports that Russia will be supplying missiles and anti-aircraft weapons to Syria.

In separate statements published by the two countries, it was said that in spite of military co-operation between them, the supply of the Russian-made weaponry to Syria is not on the agenda.

"Our co-operation with Syria is multi-faceted, including military cooperation, but it never went beyond international agreements," Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said last week. "The president's visit to Moscow will certainly not focus on the question of weapons," the Syrian Baath party spokesman said.

Syria said it expects the visit to bring about "closer commercial ties" with Russia.

Meanwhile, Russian officials condemned statements last week by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, accusing Syria of interference in Iraq and sheltering terrorists.

Syria is interested in renewing talks with Israel and expects a positive reaction from Israel, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara said during an interview with CNN. Shara said the formula for a peace agreement with Israel was total peace in exchange for total withdrawal, and added that a narrow window for peace had opened and he hoped it would open further.

Shara welcomed the talks between Israel and the Palestinians and said Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas was doing "good work." He noted that the Syrian military presence in Lebanon had decreased over the years and Syria did not intend to leave its soldiers in Lebanon forever.

Shara rejected American allegations that Syria allowed Iraqi insurgents a free hand to operate from within its territory, and that it permitted the insurgents to cross over the border from Iraq to harm American soldiers. He said the reports of the insurgents were greatly exaggerated, noting that among 25 million Iraqis, they numbered only a few hundred. If they are crossing the border of any country, he told the interviewer, it was against the will of the government of Syria.

Mossad warns of Iranian nuclear threat

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Mossad chief Meir Dagan warned Monday that the atomic threat posed by Iran will soon reach the point of no return in a nuclear arms race. Dagan, reviewing the security situation for the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, told committee members that Iran is attempting to lead the International Atomic Energy Agency astray.

According to Dagan, Russia is still helping Iran build its nuclear reactor in Bushehr.

In addition, Dagan said Iran is encouraging Hezbollah to carry out terror attacks in Israeli territory, and giving assistance to Palestinian terror organizations.

Vice-Premier Shimon Peres, responding to reports that Tehran sought to foment terrorist attacks in order to foil a Israeli-Palestinian truce, said Monday that Iran constitutes the principal problem of the Middle East, and the centre for terrorism in the region.

Ma'ariv newspaper reported Monday that Iran had "made a decision to do everything in order to torpedo an understanding between the sides." Since the relative calm in the West Bank and Gaza began, activists of the pro-Iranian Hezbollah "have flooded the territories with demands that terrorism attacks be launched," the daily said.

"Iran is the problem of the Middle East," Peres said.

"It is a group of people who have freed themselves from speaking the truth, who think that the means justify the ends, and who hide everything they do," he told Army Radio.

"It is the centre of terrorism in the Middle East. It is trying to create a nuclear option with a religious colouration."

But Peres cautioned against Israel taking on the burden of confronting Tehran.

"The Iran issue is a global one. Let the world conduct the war. How much do we need to take upon ourselves."

In any event, Peres continued, diplomatic solutions must be explored by Washington and others before any decision for military action should be taken.

Auschwitz: liberation 60 years ago

Auschwitz considered world's largest Jewish cemetery

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Set along the Sola River in southern Poland, the town of Oswiecim was for much of its history a sleepy burg of as many as 12,000 souls. Like many such towns in Poland, Jews had found a home there and on the eve of World War II, the community had been established for hundreds of years.

During World War I, the Polish army constructed a barracks in a suburb of Oswiecim, but after the war the collection of red brick buildings was also used to house Polish refugees.

In 1940, the German occupying forces put the buildings to a new use. Under orders from Heinrich Himmler, head of the SS, Oswiecim would become site of a concentration camp that would take on a German name, Auschwitz. Geared originally for Polish political prisoners, the camp was expanded and became the single largest venue for the mass murder of European Jews during the Holocaust.

Since its liberation 60 years ago on Jan. 27, 1945, it has become almost synonymous with the mass murder of six million Jews.

Other Nazi death camps took their toll – Treblinka, Sobibor, Chelmno, Majdanek, Belzec – but none operated on the sheer scale as Auschwitz. It introduced a mechanized, factory-style killing process to the annals of human depravity, but left plenty of room for individual acts of barbarity as well.

Survivors call it a "kingdom of death," a closed world populated by SS guards, doctors whose task it was to mete out death, not life, kapos raining down blows on less fortunate prisoners, hopeless, hollowed-out prisoners whose days were numbered and who were known in the camp as "musselmen," Sonderkommandos who removed bodies from the gas chambers, prisoners who sorted the personal affects of the recently gassed prisoners in a section known as "Kanada," family barracks to deceive Red Cross visitors and subterfuge to fool newly arrived prisoners into thinking they would be rejoining relatives after a quick shower.

Today, Auschwitz is considered the largest Jewish cemetery in the world, though historians and survivors differ on the number of dead at Auschwitz and its main satellite camp, Birkenau, also known as Auschwitz II.

Beginning in October 1941, the SS constructed Birkenau, a few kilometres from the main camp, to house the Jews who would be killed on arrival by the new method of poison gas (prussic acid), which was originally intended for de-lousing. Four large gas chamber/crematoria sites were constructed at one end of the camp after a successful test gassing of Soviet prisoners of war at Auschwitz I.

The Auschwitz-Birkenau Memorial and Museum cites historians who estimate the overall number of victims at the camp at between 1,100,000 and 1,500,000 people. "The majority of them, and above all the mass transports of Jews who arrived beginning in 1942, died in the gas chambers. Historians estimate that among the people sent to Auschwitz there were at least 1,100,000 Jews from all the countries of occupied Europe, more than 140,000 Poles (mostly political prisoners), approximately 20,000 Gypsies from several European countries, more than10,000 Soviet prisoners of war, and over 10,000 prisoners of other nationalities," the museum states on its website.

Rudolf Vrba, a Slovakian Jew who escaped the inferno in April 1944, puts the number at 2.25 million dead, 90 per cent of them Jews. When he escaped, the tally was already at 1,750,000, he said.

He rejects lower estimates by some historians of one million or less, a figure he calls "quite ridiculous."

Look at Treblinka, he said, the camp near Warsaw that was the site of one million murders (Other sources put the death toll between 700,000 and 900,000). Treblinka was much smaller than Auschwitz and operated for only about one year. Yet the death toll in the two camps is supposed to be almost the same, he said.

Vrba, who will not attend the remembrance activities at the camp, believes the presence there of heads of state will send a message to those who would deny the Holocaust and to those who are unfamiliar with its history.

He points to a recent opinion poll in England after Prince Harry was photographed at a costume party wearing a mock Nazi uniform with a swastika armband, that showed 60 per cent of those under 35 never heard of Auschwitz.

"Now it will be in the press and will be discussed. From that respect, for the education of the world population, it will have great repercussions," he said.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, said the anniversary comes at a moment in time when hatred of Jews is finding fertile ground in Europe. European Jews don't wear yarmulkes in public for fear of being the targets of anti-Semites. Educators in Holland and Belgium are afraid to teach about the Holocaust lest Muslim students protest and violence breaks out.

"So the message for leaders at the 60th anniversary is, 'You defeated Nazis and committed yourselves to ensuring it would not happen again. You need to take charge of the schools,'" he said.

The anniversary shows the consequences if governments don't take early action to counter bigotry. "When governments procrastinate, innocent people pay with their lives," Rabbi Hier added.

Special UN session marks death camp's liberation

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — "The evil that destroyed six million Jews and others in those camps is one that still threatens all of us today."

That statement by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan was the main message of Monday's special session of the UN General Assembly marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camp at Auschwitz.

"The global community must ensure that such horror never occurs again," Annan told reporters Sunday.

The special all-day session, which Annan described as "historic," was attended by representatives of 30 senior UN members and leading intellectuals.

The event was meticulously planned to ensure the international community would rally around it and be fully represented at the session.

Israel welcomed the UN decision to commemorate the anniversary.

"We're pleased as this is the first time since the establishment of the UN that it is commemorating the Holocaust," Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom was quoted as saying in the Jerusalem Post. "The fact that 30 nations sponsored it and that 138 nations supported it speaks of the place that Israel holds within the world of nations."

Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew was to deliver Canada's statement at the event.

"This special session will be a solemn occasion, the first of its kind in recent memory, where representatives from around the world will pause to remember this dark chapter in our history and recommit to the principles and noble ideals upon which the United Nations was founded," Pettigrew said last week.

"As we commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camps, we must renew our determination to build a better world and a greater United Nations to ensure such crimes never occur again."

Other scheduled participants were the foreign ministers of several European countries, including German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer. The foreign ministers of France, Argentina and were also slated to take part.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom was to represent Israel, while U.S. Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was to attend for the United States.

Among the scheduled speakers were U.S. Congressman Tom Lantos and Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel, both Holocaust survivors.

The climax of the session was expected to be a cantor chanting the Hebrew mourning prayer Kel Malei Rachamim. It was to be the first time a Jewish prayer has been uttered in the General Assembly. The cantor also sang Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah.

In an extraordinary step, Annan called a special press conference, together with General Assembly president Jean Ping from Gabon and Israel's UN ambassador, Dan Gillerman, the day before the special session. It was seen as a special effort on Annan's part to stress the importance of the session and the reason for holding it, "since the United Nations was founded as the world was learning the full horror of the camps," he said.

"This solemn and highly significant occasion should be seen as an expression of our commitment to build a United Nations that can respond quickly and effectively to genocide and other serious violations of human rights," Annan added.

On Monday evening, a special exhibit, sponsored by Israel's Foreign Ministry and curated by Yad Vashem, opened at UN headquarters. Titled "Auschwitz – the Depth of the Abyss," it presents photos from the Auschwitz Album, the only surviving visual evidence of the process of mass murder at the death camp taken by SS personnel.

The exhibit also includes drawings by Ukrainian artist Zinovii Tolkatchev, who painted scenes from the Majdanek death camp in the fall of 1944 as the official artist of the Russian Army.

Though the General Assembly session was only symbolic, some commentators noted its importance. "Let us not forget that this General Assembly hall that will hear Kel Malei Rachamim, and Hatikvah will be heard is the same hall that the resolution was passed by a large majority that compared Zionism to racism, which was seen as the international community questioning Israel's right to exist," one Jewish leader involved in preparing the program said.

The initiative for the special assembly to mark the 60th anniversary of Auschwitz's liberation came from Israel's Foreign Ministry. But after the proposal was transmitted officially to Annan, Israel kept a low profile in efforts to draft a majority in favour of the session, as required by the UN's charter.

"We wanted to avoid creating the impression that the session was exclusively an Israeli interest," said an Israeli diplomat in New York.

Annan, the United States and EU countries were the first to support the proposal. They were subsequently joined by other key member states, including Russia, Japan, Canada and Latin American countries.

Auschwitz: liberation 60 years ago

-Auschwitz escapee hoped to warn Hungarian Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Of the hundreds of thousands – perhaps millions – of Jews sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau, Rudolf Vrba was one of only a handful to escape.

To do so in the closely-guarded camp miles from home, to escape the SS guards, their dogs and hostile villagers, to risk the hideous tortures that awaited those who were recaptured, remains a monumental achievement. That he and his fellow escapee, Alfred Wetzler, did so to warn Hungarian Jews of their impending doom, makes it even more so.

Today a professor emeritus of pharmacology at the University of British Columbia, in the 1940s, Vrba was a humble labourer caught up in the Nazis' pitiless drive to murder Jews. He was born in 1924 in the Slovakian village of Topolcany as Walter Rosenberg. He changed his name after his escape when he joined a Slovak partisan unit.

After working as a labourer in 1942, Vrba was arrested in March for being Jewish and deported to Majdanek, another of the Nazis' infamous death camps. His time in Majdanek was brief, and on June 30, 1942, he was transferred to Auschwitz.

He was imprisoned in the main camp and was put to work in "Kanada," the camp name for the work detail that had the gruesome task of removing the dead from newly arrived trains, gathering the luggage and sorting it for the rapacious Nazi killers. Not only did they murder arriving Jews, they robbed them of everything, Vrba said.

Later, he was transferred to Birkenau, the main satellite camp of Auschwitz four kilometres away that was named for a nearby Birch wood. In Birkenau, the Nazis built four gas chamber/crematoria complexes that were the final stop for about 90 per cent of the Jews deported to the camp.

Those who survived the journey to the camp, which could take 10 days as they were shunted from siding to siding to let other traffic by, had been subjected to overcrowding (100 to a cattle car), lack of food and water, no fresh air, no room to move, stifling heat, a pot for a bathroom, and the filth and stench that ensued. Many died en route.

On arrival, survivors were split by sex into two groups and then Nazi doctors, headed by Josef Mengele, made a selection. With a casual thumb pointing to the left, a prisoner or an entire family would be consigned to the gas chambers and immediate death. Those sent to the right would be registered, tattooed and shaved and then, most often, be subjected to slave labour.

Vrba was employed in a number of jobs that gave him access to large areas of the camp. As a result, he was able to witness and document the killing process first-hand.

From August 1942 to June 1943, he worked in Kanada and was present at the arrival of nearly all train transports. During that time, he committed to memory each transport, its place of origin and the number of arrivals.

He was not the only one in the camp making that calculation, he said. "Others counted." They kept track of the number of trains or the number of trucks that ferried the prisoners from the railway ramp to the gas chambers. Yet more information was gathered from those who worked in the crematoria.

By the end of 1942, it was common knowledge that 500,000 had been killed, and by mid-1943, one million had died, he said.

In June 1943, Vrba was transferred from Kanada and made a registrar in the quarantine section in Birkenau.

From his location in the strategically located barrack, he could see the lorries packed with those who had been sent to the left drive by toward Birkenau's gas chambers.

"The barracks of Birkenau trembled when the heavy lorries went by," he said.

By the time he and Wetzler were ready to escape in April 1944, he estimates that 1,750,000 Jews had already been killed, a figure much higher than historians today accept.

He also knew that even that number was bound to rise, and rise substantially. SS guards were talking openly about getting ready to accept "a million units" of "Hungarian sausage," a euphemism for the expected Hungarian deportees. A new area of the camp, known as Mexico, was under construction to house the huge numbers expected soon.

Ironically, it was a construction site in that soon-to-be-expanded section of Birkenau that provided Vrba and Wetzler with their means of escape.

With the help of the camp underground and using the freedom he had as a camp clerk, he made his way to a pile of lumber that would soon be turned into barracks for the Hungarians. Mexico was outside Birkenau's barbed wire inner perimeter, but during the day, Nazi guards established an outer perimeter to permit activity in the area. At night they would pull back to the main camp.

With the help of other prisoners Vrba and Wetzler clambered into a hollowed-out hiding place inside the wood pile. Boards were placed around them to make it appear untouched and the area was sprinkled with a mixture of tobacco soaked in gasoline, a trick to fool the guard dogs that was learned from Russian POWs.

At the conclusion of the work day on April 7, after the outer guards had pulled back into the camp, their absence was soon discovered at the evening "appel," or roll call. The search was on.

Fortunately, their subterfuge held up and no one in the camp gave them away.

From previous escape attempts, they knew that camp authorities would not call off the search for three days, so for that period they remained in the wood pile.

On the night of the third day, they climbed out of the wood, and crawled their way to freedom.

Travelling at night, they headed in a southerly direction parallel to the Sola River, toward the Polish border with Slovakia.

> By the end of 1942, it was common knowledge that 500,000 had been killed

While working in Kanada, Vrba had managed to tear a page from a child's atlas and study Auschwitz's location in relation to surrounding areas. He knew it was only about 50 kilometres north of the eastern Slovak border and that following the Sola would bring him to his home country.

He had also noticed that prisoners' luggage contained children's books and notebooks, indicating the prisoners thought they were being resettled, not transported to their deaths.

That added to his desire to warn Hungarian Jewry of their impending fate.

Kanada provided yet another crucial element that aided in their escape. Vrba's prison stripes were traded in for a sweater, tweed jacket and riding boots, all of which were smuggled out of Kanada.

Vrba and Wetzler's escape was not without incident. For the first week, they travelled only at night, avoiding the German colonists in the region. On the third night, to avoid being out in the open, they knocked on the door of a peasant hut and were greeted by a peasant woman and her daughter. They exchanged greetings in Polish and were offered a meal and a place to stay for one day.

A few days later, they narrowly escaped a patrol by German field gendarmes, who fired on them and captured their coats and food.

A few day after that, they met a Polish woman who realized they were refugees hiding from the Germans. She contacted another Pole, who walked them to the Slovak border.

Eight days after escaping, they crossed the Slovakian border and came across a farmer named Canecky who befriended them. He told them of a Jewish doctor nearby, who, coincidentally, Vrba had known. Disguised as farm hands, they travelled to the town of Cadca, where a Dr. Pollack had an office. The collaborationist Slovak government, Vrba explained in a memoir, allowed Jewish doctors to remain in the countryside, as their absence had prompted complaints from the local population, who were afraid of losing their medical care.

Dr. Pollack referred Vrba to a contact in the Slovak Jewish council, whom Vrba and Wetzler met in the town of Zilina.

At last, they had the opportunity to tell the outside world about the machinery of death in Auschwitz.

Interviewed separately to make sure their stories coincided, Vrba and Wetzler explained in detail the operation of the camp. They described its location astride a major railway line, its layout, the procedures for robbing and murdering victims, the use of slave labour for major German firms including Krupp, Siemens and I.G. Farben. Vrba was even able to explain the fates of arriving Slovak and Czech transports and detail the time of arrival and the numbers on board – facts Jewish council members could check against their own records.

Their report, which became known as the Vrba-Wetzler report or the Auschwitz Protocol, was completed on April 27 – about two weeks before the first mass transports of Hungarian Jews began.

Vrba was told that copies of the report were in the right hands – that they had been sent to Hungary.

Then, on June 6, two new escapees, Arnost Rosin and Czeslaw Mordowicz, arrived after leaving Auschwitz on May 27. From them they learned that in the period from May 15 to 27, more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews had arrived in Auschwitz, and most had been killed on arrival.

They also learned that Hungarian Jews had boarded the trains with no knowledge of what awaited them in the camp.

To this day, Vrba remains bitter about the way his information was kept from the people it was meant to warn.

Historical documents confirm that Jewish leaders in Slovakia, Hungary, Switzerland and elsewhere knew by May 1944 what was happening in Auschwitz, but they did not warn the approximately one million Hungarian Jews who were slated for slaughter, he said.

Instead, Vrba claims, they used the information to "organize a train of 1,700 [Hungarian Jews] that travelled to Switzerland."

Vrba acknowledges that this conclusion is controversial and not accepted by many mainstream historians, some of whom say "Hungarian Jews couldn't understand it anyway, that it was above their understanding." But the train to Switzerland departed after 300,000 had already been killed, he said.

Survivor recalls night spent in death's waiting room

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Miriam Perkell's gaze narrows as she recalls the sensations: The heat, the sweat, the stench of 500 Hungarian girls and women packed into a small, low-slung concrete room with no windows, just a few glass panels up near the ceiling.

"It was so hot in there," Perkell remembers. "The sweat just poured off us. People were passing out from thirst and exhaustion. We were terribly hot." Occasionally, pails of cool water were thrown onto the unfortunates.

They stood there all night, probably eight hours, shifting from leg to leg, unable to sit, the young supporting the old. Waiting. But for what?

"In my mind, I knew I was going to survive," says Perkell, who was locked into the chamber along with her 14-year-old sister, Daisy. Perkell was just 17 during that infamous summer of 1944, when most of Hungary's Jewish women were shipped to Auschwitz in less than eight weeks.

"We all had a feeling of survival," she says, reclining on the sofa of her comfortable Toronto home. "I can't explain it. There was no panic. We didn't think of death. We talked about what we were going to cook and bake once we got home. You know, Hungarian women are good cooks. That's what kept us going."

The chamber doors abruptly clanked open, and gusts of frigid air rushed in

Just as inexplicably, the chamber doors abruptly clanked open, and gusts of frigid air rushed in. "Now we were freezing," Perkell half-chuckles. "I was wearing just a little short-sleeved dress. I've never forgotten the shock of the cold."

The women were hustled out amid screams and blows from clubs.

"As were walking out, the kapos said to us, 'You should kiss the ground. No one comes out of there alive.'"

It was only later that Perkell learned of where she'd been: A waiting room for the adjacent gas chambers. "That's where they used to put people waiting to be killed." Asked why her group was spared, she shrugs. "Sometimes, they just ran out of gas," she says nonchalantly.

Perkell spent just three weeks at Birkenau, Auschwitz's sister camp a few kilometres down the road and where most of the killing at the complex took place. It felt like three years.

She arrived at Auschwitz with her sister and parents on June 7, 1944 after a two-day train trip from the Jewish ghetto in Chust in easternmost Czechoslovakia, a region that had been ceded to Hungary.

"That was the worst. We thought we were going to be taken to the forest and killed," Perkell relates. "That's what we had heard happened to Jews."

On the train platform at Auschwitz, as the newly arrived prisoners were herded off the cars, Perkell remembers seeing Dr. Josef Mengele, the very embodiment of evil.

"He looked at people and waved his hand. This way to the gas chambers, that way to labour. My mother and I were sent one way and my sister the other. She started screaming, "Anyu, Anyu! [mother] and ran toward us. Mengele grabbed her by the wrist, but she broke away."

The Angel of Death didn't bother to pursue the girl. "He went like this," Perkell recalls, waving her hand dismissively. "He let her go."

Her father, an aristocratic banker, was sent straight to the gas chambers.

Her first impression of the death mill was almost banal. "It looked like a military camp. We never saw a dead body."

But soon, the women's heads were shaved and "we were given shmattes to wear. We didn't recognize each other. Then we knew this wasn't a work camp.

Miriam Perkell [Ron Csillag photo]

She recalls other sensations, namely, the smoky, sweet smell that many Auschwitz survivors will never forget. "We saw the chimneys, and we were so afraid. No one wanted to get sick, because then you were finished."

Perkell was assigned to a labour detail, working on a drill press in an airplane factory. "It was 13-hour days. They woke us up at 4 a.m. and the factory was five kilometres away. We had no coats. The mornings were freezing."

At the end of the shift and after the long trek back, the prisoners were forced to stand still, outdoors, for the daily "appel" – the roll call. "That took at least two hours, sometimes four and five," Perkell remembers. "We didn't get back to the barracks until late at night."

Rations – if one could call them that – consisted of a stale piece of bread "that tasted like sand" and a cup of murky soup "that tasted like mud. But people fought over it."

And that wasn't the worst of it.

"The worst thing was, there was no water. Getting washed was a terrible chore. We had to fight for a little water, and we were no fighters. When it rained, we stood under the barracks and drank the water that dripped off the roof."

Perkell, her mother and sister were soon transferred to a series of back-breaking work camps in Latvia and later to Stutthof, a brutal concentration camp near Danzig in northern Poland. She and her sister were liberated by U.S. Army troops on April 24, 1945, on a highway near the German town of Wurtzen.

She went on to work as a nanny at a World Jewish Congress-run orphanage back in the Czech city of Bratislava, and then spent seven of the happiest years of her life in Israel, two of them working for the Israeli Air Force. She fell in love with a Canadian tourist, and came to Toronto in 1956.

Now a hale 78 and mother of two grown sons, Perkell gazes out the window at the Canadian winter and reflects on her eternity spent locked in a concrete vault, in the worst place ever created by people, awaiting an unknown fate.

"You can't imagine," she says, shaking her head, "what humans can endure."

Eichmann offered to trade 'goods for blood'

"A situation developed and that is my contention, that a small group of informed people deprived others from making their own decisions in the face of mortal danger. This is my opinion," Vrba said.

"Certainly they should not have negotiated the departure of a small train and let 437,000 land in Auschwitz, not knowing anything."

Historian Martin Gilbert offers another perspective on the Hungarian deportations. On April 25, Rudolf Kasztner and other Jewish leaders in Budapest met with SS henchman Adolf Eichmann, who was offering to trade "goods for blood," specifically trucks for Jewish lives.

The Hungarian leadership, he suggests, were being enticed with an offer "to avoid the death camps altogether in return for a substantial payment."

"Those Hungarian Jewish leaders who wished to follow up the negotiations were unwilling to risk the negotiations by publicizing the facts about the annihilation process at Auschwitz," Gilbert wrote in Auschwitz and the Allies.

By the time the Hungarian leaders received a copy of the Vrba-Wetzler report on April 28, "Kasztner and his colleagues in the Zionist leadership in Hungary were already committed to their negotiations with Eichmann and to the dispatch of their colleague Joel Brand to Istanbul. They therefore gave no publicity whatsoever to the facts about Auschwitz, which were now in their possession."

Gilbert acknowledged Vrba's belief that with the knowledge of what lay ahead, Hungarian Jews would not have readily boarded the trains and the entire process could have been slowed down.

He writes, "Not urgent warnings to their fellow Jews to resist deportation, but secret negotiations with the SS aimed at averting deportation altogether, had become the avenue of hope chosen by the Hungarian Zionist leaders. Their people thus became the innocent victims of one of the countless Nazi deceptions of the war."

Needless to say, Vrba doesn't agree. "If you were chosen for the train [to Switzerland], you would think this is a good idea. If you were not chosen for the train, you'd think it was not a good idea."

On July 7, bowing to pressure from then-U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt, as well as the Vatican and local churches, Hungarian regent Miklos Horthy ordered the deportation of Jews to Auschwitz to stop. Despite the official order, the SS and their accomplices continued to send transports to the camp throughout the summer.

Teen survived selections by infamous Nazi doctor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Even before he was deported to Auschwitz, Arnold Friedman and his family knew some sort of horror lay ahead.

Only about 14 years old, Friedman was one of five children living with his parents in Chudlova, a small town in the Carpathian Mountains that today is part of Ukraine, but in 1944 had been annexed by Hungary.

His father had been dragooned into an army slave labour brigade in 1942 and sent to work in Poland. While he was away, Friedman's aunt, uncle and their family were deported to the east, but a little while later, their oldest son, then 18, returned.

He "told us of horrors," Friedman said. "They had no food and were abandoned to the slaughter of local peasantry, who were whipped into frenzy of hate against those they feared would steal their food. So they killed them.

"He told us of bodies tied together with barbed wire and floating together in the Dnieper River.

"Nobody believed him."

Arnold Friedman [Paul Lungen photo]

By 1944, rumours of atrocities were circulating, but these were dismissed as the efforts of provocateurs. People were generally comfortable and didn't want to hear about the misfortunes of others, Friedman said.

Then, when his father returned, he "spoke quietly of the horrors of the Jews in Poland."

At Passover, the stories finally gained some immediate currency when "gendarmerie told us… to gather at the town hall carrying nothing more than what we could carry on our backs because we had been declared aliens and would be sent to accumulation places," Friedman recalls.

The next day, Friedman and a friend with a wagon set out to gather potatoes for the voyage. That was the last time he saw his family. They entered Auschwitz on separate trains.

He was loaded onto a cattle car packed with about 100 people. They were provided with a barrel of water and half a barrel to use as a latrine for the eight-day trip, he said.

On arrival at Auschwitz, he went through a selection. "The kids at the selection who were not up to snuff were destroyed," Friedman said.

One of the lucky ones, Friedman was placed into a barracks with other young boys. They were given no labour assignments and no particular function other than appearing at "appel" (roll call). They spent much of their time searching for body lice.

On Rosh Hashanah, Dr. Josef Mengele, one of the camp's senior SS doctors who conducted many of the selections at the railway ramp, came to their barracks. He ordered the first row of boys to take three steps forward and gesturing with his cigarette holder, "he nonchalantly pointed to individuals. He picked out half the group. They were taken away and two days later, word came through the older prisoners that we 'better wave at the smoke coming out of the chimney, there go your friends.'"

Friedman recalled that the colour of the flames emitted from the chimneys varied, and that prompted discussion among the prisoners: "Were they burning fat Hungarian Jews or skinny Polish Jews? That was the speculation," he said.

While still in Auschwitz, he learned his mother and four sisters had been killed on arrival. His father sent word that he was working as part of the sonderkommando, the prisoners given the task of removing bodies from the gas chambers and cremating them. That was the last Friedman heard of his father, but he noted that the sonderkommando revolted in early October and sabotaged a gas chamber. At that point, all sonderkommando prisoners were killed.

During the summer, Friedman chanced to be pulled aside by a man named Zanvil, who had been a poor tailor in their hometown and who went from a very thin person to a fat one.

His job was in Kanada, the work unit that sorted the property of new arrivals. That gave him access to all sorts of food. Zanvil told Friedman, "'We're doomed. If you survive, tell the world what you see, what you know.' That stuck in my craw ever since."

Death and brutality were constant companions in Auschwitz. Blows could land on your head for no apparent reason. One Czech boy, knowing his family was doomed, gave up half his food ration to someone to teach him to say Kaddish, the prayer for the dead.

> 'We're doomed. If you survive, tell the world what you see'

In the mornings, a wagon would make the rounds in the camp, removing the bodies of those who had died in the night or who had thrown themselves against the camp's electrified perimeter fence, seeking a quick death.

Of 17 boys from Friedman's part of Hungary who had kept together in the camp, only five survived.

Selections for death in his barrack often came during Jewish holidays. One was on Rosh Hashanah, another on Yom Kippur. Friedman can still remember Mengele picking half the barrack on Yom Kippur for death.

"As they were marched off they said, 'Remember our yahrzeit [anniversary of death].' Since then, they haven't aged. They're still frozen in my memory," Friedman said.

Friedman remained in Auschwitz until December 1944, when the Nazis evacuated the camp ahead of the Soviet advance. Prisoners were taken on a death march towards Germany. Bodies filled both sides of the road during the winter evacuation, but Friedman was one of a small group who survived. He was liberated in April near Garmisch-Partenkirchen in southern Germany.

SHOAH MEMORY
by Arnold Friedman and Sherry Levy

I remember!

Crumbling walls, grotesque death chambers,
Houses of horror, silent screams hang in the air,
Lifeless, gas-choked innocent martyrs,
A world without pity, they did not care.

I Remember!

Blood-red flames, human flesh burning,
Smoldering charred corpses, a Holocaust-inferno
Choking stench, smoke-belching chimneys,
Innocent victims – how could they know?

I Remember!

Gaping fiery furnaces in a feeding frenzy
Devouring humans day and night
Heavens were – astonishingly silent –
A blasphemous – unholy carnage – a gruesome sight.

I Remember!

Scratched walls, victims gasping their last,
Criminal master race, rapacious, merciless killers,
"Gott is with us," they proclaimed from their lofty heights,
Macabre, vainglorious madmen – Hitler's Crusader Knights.

I Remember!

Heinous monsters, descendants of prehistoric creatures,
Masquerading holy warriors – Wagner's pride,
Children slaughtered in their mothers' arms,
Sages and saints annihilated – no one answered their cries.

I Remember!

Tortured survivors death marches –
Brutal soldiers herding them like cattle,
Ghastly rows of straggling, starved skeletons,
Wintry, bitter cold took its toll – few survived this battle.

I Remember!

A shocked, victorious world stood in awe,
Seeing sights no human mind could conceive,
Gates of hell revealed living dead,
Their survival no one could believe.

I Remember!

Give the beggars bread and water,
Let them stay in D.P. camps where they are –
Guard our brothers lest they come to our shores,
We have enough of their kind – we don't need any more.

'We basically were waiting to die'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Judy Cohen arrived at the railway ramp in Birkenau in mid-summer 1944 with her vast extended family. Selected to go to the right, and hence toward life, she and her three sisters stood helplessly as their parents, sister-in-law, 18-month-old nephew and numerous cousins and their young children were chosen to go to the left.

Back in her hometown of Debrecen, Hungary, many of her relatives had been forced to move into the three adjacent buildings her immediate family of 18 had occupied in what would later become the Jewish ghetto. Now, of the 96 relatives who had jammed into the premises, most were being selected for the left – to death.

A single woman had a chance at survival

"Out of the 96 in the ghetto, 16 came back," she said.

Even on the train, there was foreshadowing that they were entering a strange new world. As they were ordered to leave the train quickly, prisoners in striped uniforms encouraged the women to hand their babies to the older women. They knew that older people and women with children were slated to die, but a single woman had a chance at survival, she said.

Without the chance to say goodbye to their family, Cohen and her sisters were settled in "Mexico," the newest and poorest section of Birkenau that had been constructed to house the massive influx of Hungarian Jews.

"There was no work," she said. "We basically were waiting to die."

Prisoners slept on the bare floor, they used pails as toilets and there was no running water.

Within a few days, older prisoners explained why there was a strange odour in the air. "Those who went to the left went to the gas chambers and were cremated and that's what we smelled," Cohen said. "It was very difficult to believe it, but we believed it eventually."

For the first few nights, "700 women were crying through the night. Later they stopped crying and we knew we had to survive."

It quickly became clear that the skinniest and unhealthiest prisoners would be gassed, so keeping up one's strength became imperative.

Eating the disgusting rations required a great deal of will, Cohen said. After the 4 a.m. roll call, which could take hours "and was torture itself, we were given a black liquid they called coffee."

At noon, prisoners were given soup. "It was the most disgusting thing. You might find some turnips floating it it; we found bugs, sand, pieces of glass. We joked they mowed the grass and threw it in."

"[My sister] Elizabeth, who was 12 years older [Cohen was 15], said we must survive and she fashioned spoons for us. She held my nose and said you have to eat to survive."

In the evening, they were served a slice of a sour rye bread, sometimes with margarine, marmalade or a small piece of salami.

"No wonder so many people starved to death. We were bald skeletons walking around, eventually."

At the end of August, Cohen's sisters Eva, 18, and Clara, 22, were taken away for work. Elizabeth undertook heavy labour to get an extra ration and she would bring it to Judy, who had been hospitalized with inflammation of the hip joint.

After two weeks in the hospital, she was released.

By fall, her three sisters were transported out of the camp, leaving Cohen alone. She and two girls from her hometown became "camp sisters," who helped each other survive. The three later were forced onto a winter death march out of Auschwitz, but they survived and were put to work in an airplane factory.

After the war she learned that one of her brothers, Leslie Weissenberg, had survived in Austria and they were told their sister Eva, had survived a deportation to Bergen-Belsen.

"Eva told us Clara had been taken to Stutthof concentration camp in the north" and that Elizabeth was there as well. Despite being camp sisters together, they could not save each other. Clara and Elizabeth, who had always made sure her little sister was eating, starved to death. Eva was unconscious and near death when British soldiers liberated the camp.

Cohen has been back to Auschwitz three times as part of the March of the Living, the program that brings young people to the death camp and reaffirms Jewish survival with a subsequent trip to Israel.

Much of the camp has changed, Cohen said, and Mexico is completely gone, its wooden barracks disassembled and the lumber given to Polish peasants.

Cohen, who speaks regularly on Holocaust issues, runs a website that pays tribute to women victims of the Holocaust: www.womenandtheholocaust.com.

Liberation by U.S. soldiers 'a monumental feeling'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Max Eisen had seen horror before, but there was a strange kind of fear in the eyes of the American soldiers he encountered at war's end.

American tanks emblazoned with white stars had just burst through the gate at the Ebensee camp near Salzburg and had to swerve to avoid a pile of bodies.

As the tank crews tried to make sense of what they were seeing, strange, pale, unreal apparitions appeared around them and lifted their arms towards them. The soldiers, members of the Fighting 761st, the Black Panther Tank Battalion, recoiled from the unnatural sight.

"Their eyes couldn't believe it. These soldiers were horrified. People were trying to walk up and touch them and they were climbing up the turrets. They thought we were ghosts," Eisen said.

For Eisen, 15 at the time, liberation was "a monumental feeling." It meant decent treatment for the first time in a year, food and a comfortable army cot to sleep in, not the wooden planks or hard ground he had become used to. It meant life, not death.

Ever since he and his family had been deported from the small town of Moldava, Slovakia, in 1944, he had stared at death at every turn.

From the moment they arrived at the eerily lit railway ramp in Auschwitz in the middle of the night, with its SS officers and barking dogs, "I felt something was wrong."

There was also "a terrible stench in the air. I didn't know what it was, but it smelled like in town when they shoed a horse. At the time I didn't know it was the stench from the crematoria."

Eisen, his father, Zoltan, and uncle, Jeno, were separated from the rest of the family. His grandfather, grandmother, mother, sisters and aunts were taken away.

His group was marched into a barrack, undressed, had their hair cut and showered. The next morning they asked the other prisoners when they would see their families.

"The oldtimers laughed and said, 'Don't you know where you are? Your family has gone up in smoke.'"

Eisen, his father and uncle were assigned to a "Landwirtschaft," a land maintenance work unit given the task of draining nearby swamps. It was backbreaking work, but from their vantage point, they could see transports arriving, as well as the selections and the marches into the gas chambers and crematoria.

Eisen credits his father and uncle with keeping him alive. "Had they not been with me, I wouldn't have survived past the first week," he said. "I couldn't [keep] down that soup, but my father practically rammed it down my throat. A few days later, it tasted good."

In August 1944, his father and uncle were selected for death. "I found them in the quarantine barrack and had a few minutes to say goodbye," Eisen recalled. "It was probably the worst moment of my life, knowing my guardian angels were being taken from me."

After their deaths, he soldiered on. "It was just plain luck. I just continued to put one foot ahead of the other. My father told me I had to keep going."

On Jan. 23, 1945, four days before the camp's liberation, Eisen was put on the last transport out of the camp. He spent final few months of the war at hard labour in Pilsen, Mauthausen, and finally at Ebensee.

By that time "I was at the stage where I couldn't care one way or another."

When the American soldiers arrived, he was reduced to crawling on his stomach. It took him three months to recover before he could start a new life that would bring him to Canada.

Canada backs hearing-loss treatment centre in Jordan

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is contributing $383,000 to an early detection and treatment of hearing-loss program for newborns in Jordan.

The announcement was made recently at the third international workshop of the Middle East Association for the Management of Hearing Loss (MEHA) in Amman, Jordan.

MEHA is an association of senior medical officers and healthcare professionals from Jordan, Israel, the West Bank and Gaza.

The money from CIDA goes directly to the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), MEHA's parent organization.

Arnold Noyek, CISEPO's chair, says CIDA's contribution, along with earlier initiatives, will provide early detection and treatment of hearing loss for 130,000 newborns at 45 locations in Jordan over the next two years.

"The model of screening and rehabilitation used in this project is the same one initiated in Ontario in 2002, making use of the expertise and lessons learned there," he says.

Noyek, an otolaryngologist at Mount Sinai Hospital and a University of Toronto professor, participated in the MEHA workshop in Jordan.

At the workshop, Jordanians were told about the impact the hearing screening program would have on the lives of deaf children, their families and society.

"It was remarkably successful, bringing together all segments of Jordanian society while demonstrating the fruits of Arab and Israeli co-operation," Noyek says.

Noyek says hereditary hearing deficiency is a significant public health concern in Jordan. "Because of… intermarriages between cousins, the prevalence is more than six times that in the developed world. Such conditions impact heavily on family and community well-being and development."

He told The CJN that the hearing-loss treatment centre is remarkable because it involves Jordanian, Israeli and Palestinian individuals and institutions under a Canadian umbrella.

"It will serve as a model for other regional co-operative programs in hearing loss and other common-ground public health issues."

CISEPO also supports a Palestinian and Israeli research program on the genetics of hearing loss. It is a basic science laboratory and community partnership between Bethlehem University and Tel Aviv University.

"When you work on common goals and learn from each other, there is a bond that builds understanding. Once people get to know one another, it's just ordinary people working together," Noyek says.

CISEPO is a volunteer health sector NGO based at the Department of Public Health Sciences at the U of T and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health at Mount Sinai Hospital.

At the Amman workshop, John Holmes, Canada's ambassador to Jordan, said that "CISEPO's work in the region not only addresses a pressing health concern [but also] through the partnerships it has developed, CISEPO continues to promote greater understanding and co-operation among the people in the region."

CISEPO has been working in the Middle East and Canada with Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian colleagues and institutions to meet common public health needs as a basis for building bridges of understanding and co-operation for more than 10 years, Noyek says.

The organization operates several programs in the Middle East, including projects related to nutrition, mother and child health, geriatrics and online learning. It brings Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian medical and health students to Canada and operates the Visiting Professors for Peace program.

The workshop in Amman was under the patronage of Jordan's minister of health, Said Darwazah.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Like many others, my New Year's resolution is to lose weight. I have decided after many failed fad diets to do it the healthy way and hire a dietitian or nutritionist. Can you tell me if there is a difference between the two? Where can I find someone, how much will it cost and what can I expect in terms of service and counselling?

A. Registered dietitians are trained nutrition professionals who counsel patients on many nutritional and dietary issues. A "nutritionist" – the term can be used by anyone without formal training – may be less expensive because she or he has significantly less training.

To hire a dietitian, ask your doctor for a referral or visit the Dietitians of Canada website to find someone in your area.

The cost of nutritional counselling varies, depending on where in Canada you live, the experience and training of the person and the length of counselling sessions. As a guideline, you can expect to pay from $75 to $150 for the initial consultation, with a follow-up session costing from $15 to $50. Nutritional counselling is not covered by OHIP in Ontario, but some insurance plans cover it. If you are looking for good advice on nutrition without committing to counselling, pick up a book written by a dietitian.

What you can expect from nutritional counselling depends on the dietitian's experience and background, so ask questions before making an appointment to see if her or his philosophy fits with your needs.

When I see a new patient, I spend about 45 minutes to an hour assessing the person's goals, medical history and lifesyle. I then go through what they typically eat.

A good dietitian is most successful when she or he makes recommendations that will least affect a person's lifestyle. If someone eats out often, for example, we have to work with that so as not to overwhelm the patient. By the end of the initial session, I make several recommendations, which may include introducing breakfast and specific food changes, and/or increasing physical activity.

I usually see patients for a follow-up session anywhere from one to six weeks after the initial consultation. We discuss how the changes to their eating habits and level of physical activity went, and I make additional recommendations. Changing everything all at once does not usually lead to success.

By the end of the sessions with a dietitian, patients should be educated about nutrition and know how to make the best choice for themselves – and which foods are poor choices.

I feel sorry for a person in a restaurant who says, "I'm watching my weight. I'll have a Caesar salad and a cranberry juice" and thinks she or he is eating low-calorie food. A dietitian should help patients in that situation.

Counselling sessions usually also include discussions of behavioural issues around food, because many people know what food choices they should be making but can't stick to them. If this describes you, make sure the person you hire provides you with emotional support, too.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

Young novelist addresses the war without portraying its events

The Final Solution: A Story of Detection by Michael Chabon, HarperCollins

By NORMAN RAVVIN

Michael Chabon is among the most interesting young writers at work today.

His Pulitzer Prize-winning novel The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay (2000) established him as a voice to be reckoned with. It addresses high and low cultural themes and American history, with the Holocaust and European immigration as its back-story.

Norman Ravvin

Kavalier & Clay is a loving reproduction of the era of Jewish comic-book artists, who established the industry's tone and style. The novel's ingenious creation is the young Josef Kavalier, an escapee from wartime Prague, whose highest artistic goal is the production of a comic-book hero based on the Golem, presented in a style reminiscent of prewar German Expressionist film.

Kavalier & Clay opens spectacularly, portraying Josef in Prague, not yet an emigrant, as he attempts a Houdiniesque escape from a sack that has plummeted from the famous Charles Bridge.

Chabon's recent novella is not nearly as ambitious; it's one-fifth the length of its predecessor, and styles itself A Story of Detection. This is the subtitle appended to the far more provocative lead title, which is The Final Solution. Like Kavalier & Clay, The Final Solution opens smartly. A mute boy wonders through a quiet English countryside. His companion is a "handsome gray parrot," which sits on his shoulder and spouts, in an "oddly breathy voice," a seemingly nonsensical stream of numbers in German.

Much about Chabon's characters in The Final Solution remains opaque. We learn enough about the boy to know that he is in fact one of the European Jewish children who were sent by their parents to live with families in England. We know that there is something important about the parrot's coded numeric lists, for the bird belonged to a high-ranking Nazi in its earlier life. And the story of detection at the heart of the novel follows a rather comic investigation regarding a murder and the theft of the bird.

Where Kavalier & Clay strove to become that great baggy monster – the great American novel – The Final Solution is modelled on a more modest British precursor: the stories of ratiocination pioneered by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Where the pace and voice of Kavalier & Clay was American, The Final Solution reads as if Chabon has been cramming Dickens and a host of other Brits. The book's humour, as well as its characters – in particular the old man who stands in as Chabon's detective – are Anglo-Saxon to their core.

The German Jewish refugee boy and his parrot move through the English landscape like ghosts, the boy mute, the bird incomprehensible, while Chabon focuses his satire on English types and country life. This strategy of addressing the war obliquely, without portraying its actual events, has become a familiar one among young writers, who wish to encompass wartime events in their fiction without claiming to be able to represent them fully. Chabon's approach is intriguing, for it presents the war as a traumatic past (the boy's) and as a European enigma (the parrot) while the events of the conflagration are still ongoing, offstage. In this way, war enters the narrative as part of life, inevitable, yet strange.

Chabon is a key figure among young American writers who are dedicated to presenting alternative views of Jewish identity and culture. In the comic-book artists he portrayed in Kavalier & Clay, he recognizes a band of unsung culture heroes, who, incidentally, are similarly revered by Art Spiegelman of Maus fame. In interviews, Chabon has spoken about a novel-in-progress called Hotzeplotz, which picks up on a little-known plan in 1939 to settle Jewish refugees in the Alaskan wilderness. Imagining a Yiddish heartland in the American north is not unlike Philip Roth's mining in Operation Shylock of what one character calls Diasporism – the notion that Jews might move back to the European nations they were driven from by Hitler.

These narrative ploys suggest the possibility of other pasts, and remind us that events related to the Holocaust were not inevitable, but man-made. Exactly what the boy and his parrot might tell us about the war in Europe remains a mystery. At the novel's end, we find them waiting in a train station, singing sweetly to each other.

Chabon's imaginative tableaux are weighty, funny, and often wise. The Final Solution is a breezy gloss on his previous work.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is the co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Lawyer reflects on being fired by Donald Trump

By BYRON PASCOE
and PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

With millions watching, business mogul Donald Trump gives 18 people the opportunity of a lifetime.

They get the chance to compete for a job that only one of them can win: to run one of his companies.

That is the premise of the Emmy-nominated reality TV show, The Apprentice, now in its third season.

The job hopefuls are assigned tasks that range from consulting assignments for major corporations such as Levi Strauss and Unilever to embarking on entrepreneurial ventures in sectors from real estate to pet services.

In each episode, Trump fires one of the players on the losing team.

One of the candidates during the show's second season was Stacy Rotner, a 27-year-old Jewish attorney.

"I rise to these types of challenges and thought it would be a unique experience that could open a lot of doors, and it really has," she says. "I'm thrilled that I did it."

Rotner acknowledges that her strong belief in herself, which was quite evident in the series, comes from having a supportive family who taught her to stand up for what she believes in.

"I believe in my abilities and I've always gone after what I want. I also don't take things personally, which I think is very important.

"I come from a family who belongs to a Conservative synagogue. Being Jewish has always been an important part of my life. It's really brought my family together."

Rotner has a strong connection to Israel. "When I was 15, I went on USY Israel and Poland Pilgrimage. I think it made a huge difference in my life. It was really a wonderful experience for me. Going from Poland to Israel made me appreciate Israel and my freedoms in the United States. It also really strengthened my ties to the Jewish community," she says.

"Ever since then I have been extremely active in various Jewish organizations and have felt very culturally and religiously aware."

If Rotner had won the competition and got a job with Donald Trump, she says that she would have used the opportunity to learn. "I think that I would be a great person to be swept under his wing, to learn about how he deals with various situations," she says.

"His job is not narrow and one-sided. He deals with all facets of his business."

Since she was on the show, Rotner has received several book and radio offers. "They are all based on myself as a professional. I think that is what has been so exciting," she says. "I have been able to use my legal education as a stepping-stone for where this is going to lead me."

Rotner engages in public speaking now. "People can expect a lively experience with some… motivational topics," she says. "It's great to listen to someone who has a candid no-nonsense approach while retaining a sense of humour, and that would be me."

Rotner's website, www.stacyrotner.com, has generated much e-mail. "Many of them are from guys who want to go out. Many are from women who want to know how I've gotten to where I am," she says.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 18. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

PRESIDENTIAL KOSHER HOLIDAYS

Documentary looks at why Auschwitz wasn't bombed

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

One of the most debated arguments among Holocaust historians has been whether or not the Allies should have bombed Auschwitz, knowing full well that each day thousands of Jews and other prisoners were being massacred.

On Jan. 27, the anniversary of the camp's liberation, History Television is airing the broadcast premiere of Auschwitz: The Forgotten Evidence, which considers this argument from all perspectives.

Unique to this documentary is footage of aerial photos of Auschwitz taken accidently by American reconnaissance planes in August 1944 as they photographed the nearby IG Farben chemical plant.

One of the photos clearly shows the full layout of the camp, and shows a transport train unloading its victims. But these pictures were never analyzed and were filed away for more than 30 years.

By the time the photos were taken, the Allies knew full well about the German intention to eradicate European Jewry. Although they were skeptical when they first received evidence in 1942, by the summer of 1944 they were no longer in doubt.

On July 6, 1944, British prime minister Winston Churchill was sent a petition from the Jewish Agency to stop the mass killings by bombing the camp. Churchill favoured bombing Auschwitz and called the Holocaust "the greatest crime ever committed in the history of the whole world."

The Allies debated the merits of bombing the camp. But after three months the idea was rejected. The documentary shows there were three ideas floating around:

- To send low-flying fighter planes from captured bases in Italy to launch a precision attack against the crematoria. The fighter planes, however, weren't made for such long-range missions and their capability to carry out the mission, while possible, was dubious.
- To bomb the railway links only. The Allies were already doing this all over Europe so this was possible. The trouble, though, one historian says, was that the Germans could rebuild the rails within hours or days. So it would have required a sustained bombing attempt, using up too many valuable Allies resources.
- The most likely scenario – send in heavy bombers. These bombers, used mostly to destroy military and industrial installations, would likely disrupt the killings at Auschwitz, but would probably destroy the whole camp, killing most of its prisoners.

The Allies decided the best way to liberate the Jews was to win the war, and their priority became bombing military and industrial targets. Would the bombing of Auschwitz have succeeded? The documentary examines possible outcomes.

The documentary, premiering on Jan. 27 at 9 p.m., includes never-before-seen images of the aerial shots, as well as photos taken inside the camps and interviews with historians and survivors.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

17th-CENTURY ITALIAN JEWISH COMPOSER IS FOCUS OF MUSICAL EVENING

The Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra joins with distinguished English soprano Emma Kirkby to tell the story of 17th-century Jewish composer Salamone Rossi through a selection of Italian love songs, chamber music and excerpts from Rossi's Songs of Solomon.

Rossi, a highly regarded composer at the ducal court in his native Mantua, was forced to lead a double life since he was obliged to live in the Jewish ghetto. Well-known at court for his secular Italian music, he also wrote sacred Jewish music. His Hebrew settings of psalms and prayers brought art music into the synagogue for the first time and were said to radically challenge Jewish music traditions.

Rossi's story "resonates with the multicultural lives of many contemporary Canadians," said Jeanne Lamon, Tafelmusik's music director.

Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, 427 Bloor St. W. $69, $48, $34. Feb. 2 to 6. 416-964-6337.

Neil Simon in North York: Encore Entertainment presents the Neil Simon comedy Jake's Women, with actor Martin Buote, about a novelist facing a marital crisis. Jake, still in love with his late first wife, is about to separate from his second. When reality becomes too painful, he retreats into the rich world of his imagination. In Simon's capable hands, the demarcation line between reality and fantasy becomes a messy but delightful blur.

The director is Mark Tingle, the producer Merle Garbe. $26-$24. Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, 5040 Yonge St. Jan. 27 to Feb. 6. 416-733-0558. www.encore shows.com

Piano Quartet Plays Morawetz: The Chrylark Arts and Music Series continues its celebration of composer Oskar Morawetz, a retired professor emeritus who taught music theory and composition at the University of Toronto from 1946 to 1982. Born in Prague in 1917, Morawetz came to Canada in 1940 and holds both the Order of Ontario and the Order of Canada.

As the second of five concerts in Chrylark's current season, the Veritas Piano Quartet with David Visentin performs compositions by Brahms, Morawetz and Schumann. Heliconian Hall, 35 Hazelton Ave. $15 at the door; reception follows concert. Sunday, Feb. 6, 3 p.m.

Comedy at Poor Alex: Tap Dancing Through the Boardroom, a play written and performed by Neale S. Godfrey, focuses on the supposedly true-life adventures of a hilarious heroine named… Neale Godfrey. As an ultra-successful Jewish woman in New York, Neale is "the Lucille Ball of the business world" as she commits endless faux pas and foibles on her traipse up the ladder of success in America's glitzy media world.

Directed by Kate Lyn Reiter, produced by Jonathan Hirsh in association with Kyle Godfrey-Fraebel. $28-$30. At the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave., until Jan. 30. 416-371-2216. Website, www.onesharp eye.com/tap

Klezmer-Folk-Jazz at CBC: Klezmer and eastern European folk music meet bluegrass and jazz in "Beyond the Creaking Trees," a collaborative concert featuring Beyond The Pale and the Creaking Tree String Quartet. The plan is for each group to perform a set, then combine into a 10-piece ensemble to play some new genre-bending compositions. The CBC intends to record the event for future broadcast.

Glenn Gould Studio, CBC Building, 250 Front St. W. $20. Saturday, Feb. 12, 8 p.m. 416-205-5555. Website, www.beyondthe pale.net

Names in the News: Joshua Cohen, a retired journalist in Toronto, has published Kosher Cuts and Bible Belts, a softcover book of "55 delightful dramas and drawings." He explains that he was inspired to write it after attending a writing class at the Bernard Betel Centre in north Toronto. He also drew the cartoons, an achievement that he says amazed both himself and his wife since he previously "hadn't drawn a thing since I was a kid with a piece of chalk doing profiles of horses on the pavement." Japanese-American celebrates her Judaism in musical

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

She was born Christine Frances Masaye Horii, a Japanese-American girl educated in a private Christian school, who grew up to be a dancer and actress.

Today, she is Rachel (pronounced the Hebrew way) Factor, an Orthodox Jew living in Jerusalem, who has so enthusiastically embraced her new religion and lifestyle that she has created a show for Jewish women to remind them how fortunate they are.

"Audiences have been inspired by learning that someone like me, coming from such a different experience, could find happiness and fulfilment in something they may take for granted," she said.

J.A.P. is a one-woman musical in which Factor, 36, tells her unusual story, drawing on her theatrical talents. In her former life, Factor – as Tina Horii – was a Rockette in Radio City Music Hall's The Christmas Spectacular, an ensemble member of the Broadway productions of Miss Saigon and Shogun, and played several Shakespearean roles.

She also had parts in TV shows ranging from the soap opera As The World Turns to David Letteman's The Late Show.

Factor is currently touring J.A.P. at 60 North Americans venues, and has three engagements in Montreal Jan. 29-31 and five in Toronto Feb. 1-5. All are for women only.

"The title J.A.P. is a bit provocative, but it was too good to pass up," said Factor, from Baltimore, in a telephone interview. "I've not had a single comment that it was derogatory. In fact, Jewish women kind of like it. In the show, I break down 'J.A.P.' [Jewish American Princess] and look at the stereotype."

Rachel Factor with her son Shalom.

The double entendre, of course, also refers to her Japanese origin and growing up a member of a visible minority. Although she's "100 per cent American," Factor said she alway felt a bit like an outsider.

The show was her way of dealing with her identity struggle and other emotions she felt along her journey to Judaism.

Factor was raised in Honolulu. Her grandparents had a Buddhist background and her parents were not religious, but sent her to a private school founded by Christian missionaries.

She describes her teenage years as being "tortured" until she discovered dance as a means of self-expression. She began her career in Los Angeles and then moved to New York.

"I was searching all avenues for truth and beauty, and tried many lifestyles," Factor said.

At 29, she met Todd Factor, a commercial producer who is Jewish. Two years later and after her conversion by a Conservative rabbi, the couple married.

Conversion was not something she undertook lightly. "Initially, I felt it was not something I could do. I wasn't practising any religion and Judaism seemed so foreign."

Todd was not religious or even especially well-versed in Judaism. Together they studied the religion, and Rachel found "it was so right. I agreed with everything – it was so intelligent." Gradually, they became more observant.

Their attraction to a "Torah way of life" began with the birth of their first son, Ariel, in August 2002. The bris was performed by an Orthodox mohel. Todd began attending the morning minyan at a neighbourhood Orthodox shul.

At Sukkot that year, the family was invited to the home of Adina and Rabbi Yehuda Zakutinsky, director of the Jewish outreach program Hashevaynu, for a traditional holiday meal. The way they were welcomed and the joy they experienced proved a turning point.

Rachel (still Tina) undertook to convert again, according to Orthodoxy, and by Passover the next year emerged from the mikvah with her new Hebrew name. Ariel, then eight months old, was also converted, taking the dunk in his father's arms.

The family moved to Israel a year ago. A second son, Shalom, has since been born and his bris took place in the haredi district of Mea Sharim in Jerusalem.

Todd (now Tovia) is studying full-time in a kolel, and Rachel is learning Hebrew and settling into a very different world.

Besides the spiritual enrichment Torah Judaism has given her, Factor said it is the way the Jewish community has received her that has convinced her she has made the right decision.

"Before converting, I worried whether this would be just be just another place where I didn't fit in. But I could not have been more wrong. All streams of Judaism have welcomed me, and especially the Orthodox. Once they know I'm Jewish, they accept me warmly. In Israel, it's incredible – they all want to give me a big hug."

Her own family has been remarkably accepting of her choice, she said. "My mother just bought new pots and pans and dishes for us, which we use when we visit." Factor is determined that her sons will be proud of their Japanese, as well as Jewish, heritage.

J.A.P. will be presented in Toronto on Feb. 1 at 8 p.m., at Shaarei Tefillah synagogue; on Feb. 2 at 8 p.m., at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre; on Feb. 3 at 8 p.m., at the Miles Nadal JCC, and on Feb. 5 at 8:30 p.m., at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue.

2004 was a big year for Jewish-themed video releases

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The past year saw a bumper crop of Jewish interest films released to the home video market. I've reported on some of these in the past, but there have been so many that it's been impossible to keep up with all of them.

First, let's look at the videos that should be available right now in video stores across the country. If you can't find them, your local video store can order them for you, or you can buy them online at www.amazon.ca.

The year opened up with the release of one of the worst films of the year, Marci X, a film that stereotypes and denigrates all Jewish women.

Capturing the Friedmans, one of the best films of the year, was released shortly thereafter. It documents the trials and tribulations of a Jewish family in the New York area in which the father and one of his sons were arrested and charged with sexual crimes against a number of young boys.

Dummy was a comedy that featured Adrien Brody as a troubled young Jewish man who becomes a ventriloquist.

Springtime saw the DVD release of Schindler's List, which was accompanied by the release of Broken Silence, a Steven Spielberg production that featured five hour-long documentaries by five renowned directors, all using interview material provide by the Shoah Foundation.

Bonhoefer is a documentary that tells the true story of a German priest who publicly opposed the Nazis' persecution of the Jews.

In late spring, Alliance Atlantis released Haven, a television miniseries, about Ruth Gruber's efforts to save more than 1,000 Holocaust survivors and bring them to the United States.

Summertime saw the release of the Israeli film Return From India, about an Israeli couple who travel to India to rescue their daughter, who has been hospitalized with a severe illness.

Monsieur Ibrahim brought Omar Sharif back to international prominence as an elderly Muslim taking a young Jewish boy under his wing and becoming the boy's surrogate father.

Broken Wings was one of the best films to come out of Israel in some time. After her husband passes away, a mother and her four children must carry on and rebuild their shattered lives.

In the fall came the documentary Heir to an Execution, a look at the infamous Rosenberg spy case through the eyes of one of their granddaughters.

There were also two Israeli films released on home video: Fictitious Marriage and Hill Halfon Doesn't Answer.

Other video releases toward the end of the year included the Amos Gitai drama Alila and the outrageous but wonderful comedy The Hebrew Hammer, as well as the Israeli films The Troupe, Lul/Shablool, Alex In Love, The Hit and Songs In Uniform.

Finally, we also had the documentary Hiding and Seeking, the story of a Jewish man and his two sons who head to Poland to find the farmers who saved his father's life during the Holocaust.

Other films that were released on home video in the United States this past year include Yossi and Jagger, God Is Great, I'm Not, Kedma, Samy Yo (Sammy and Me), Secret Lives: Hidden Children and Their Rescuers during World War II, Crown Heights, Komedient, Geburtig, Inner Tour, James' Journey To Jerusalem, Promises, Bonjour Monsieur Shlomi, The Holy Land and Samson.

Poet grapples with tragedy and its aftermath

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Bygone Daughters of a Lesser Fate: a Poetic Memoir by Sophie Soil (PublishAmerica) is a kind of poetic saga, mainly in free-form. It spans Europe and America through two world wars and the decades since.

The poems testify to three generations of personal and family history. Their overall theme is the struggle of three women to build worthwhile lives in spite of tragedy in World War I, the bleak time between the wars "eking out some daily/ bread (sometimes not so daily)," the Holocaust, and dislocation after World War II.

Soil strives to do more than record real-world events and her emotional response to them. She works at thinking things through, to understand both tragedy and the heroic attempts to overcome it. And in poems like lasting marks, she minces no words about how bleakness and cruelty can make their victims brutal.

Soil tries to compress as much memory as she can into each line or phrase. When this effort fails, the language becomes tortuous, overwhelming the reader with confused impressions in lines such as "…the/ seed of death began slowly wreaking its/ havoc into the red tapestry of his blood."

The purpose of the poet's craft is to recreate a feeling so that the reader can empathize with it, without being overwhelmed by it. Often, Soil achieves this aim, as in poems such as caterpillars and night is long.

In the optimistic poems near the end of the book, the imagery is much clearer than in the pieces that document atrocity, but it's not always as powerful. Poets often find it harder to capture the uniqueness of positive experience.

We know that the human spirit can triumph even over the long succession of atrocities that was the Shoah, but something so monstrous permanently wounds those who survive it. They build new lives of their own, with children of their own, but as poems such as Mamma's hands and volatile element show, their past always lives within them.

These pages are not easy to read, but they are worthwhile.

Pecker looking for answers for AHL scoring slump

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Cory Pecker of the Cincinnati Mighty Ducks had every reason to be down after his team's back-to-back losses to the Manitoba Moose earlier this season.

Yet the Montreal native demonstrated class and menschlichkeit (behaviour worthy of respect) despite his and his club's disappointing performances in an American Hockey League (AHL) weekend match-up.

To make matters worse, the losses brought to 11 the number of consecutive road defeats suffered by the not-so-Mighty Ducks. (The team has bounced back somewhat and is now in fourth place in the AHL's west division with a .476 winning percentage).

Cory Pecker

As the players went about their business showering, dressing and packing their equipment bags for Edmonton, the next stop on their unsuccessful five-game road swing, Pecker sat down for a conversation.

A seventh round selection of the Calgary Flames in the 1999 NHL draft, Pecker had been a star with the Erie Otters of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL). The curly-haired 5-11, 198-lb. right winger was a prolific scorer in junior, scoring 53 goals and 46 assists in only 56 games in his final season with the Otters.

Released by the Flames before he had ever played a game with their AHL club in St John, N.B., Pecker was signed by Anaheim, Cincinnati's parent club. In 2002-03, he potted 20 goals for the Mighty Ducks, a franchise record for a rookie, and added 13 helpers.

Despite the impressive debut, last year his numbers dropped to nine goals and 15 assists in games split between Cincinnati and Binghamton, to whom he was loaned for 14 games.

This season has been a nightmare scoring-wise. In 36 games, he has one goal and six assists. He admitted that losing had become "demoralizing," particularly since he is playing with "a great bunch of guys with a world-class goalie [Russian Ilya Bryzgalov]."

As for his personal accomplishments, Pecker is still looking for answers.

"Tonight I had a breakaway, and I just couldn't score," he recounted. "It's been happening to me. I still feel that I'm working hard every night doing other things, but it's very frustrating. You know I scored a lot in junior. I keep trying and trying, but hopefully one will go in. You know, we've still got 60 games and I'm not that worried yet."

Pecker understands his 20-goal season debut owed a lot to being given plenty of duty on the power play.

His role with the Mighty Ducks has changed somewhat.

"It makes a big difference," he said. "but there is still no excuse for my not scoring."

Pecker speaks of his ethnicity with pride.

"There's not too many Jewish hockey players out there," he said. "It's something special. You know young Jewish kids come up to me and they want to play hockey and they see that I've done it. I remember a player when I was growing up, Steve Dubinsky [a former pro centre who played 375 games in the NHL], who inspired me a lot, so you try to do the same thing.

"I come from a culture," Pecker continued, " where parents don't want their kids going into sports as much as they want them to become a doctor or a lawyer."

Pecker describes his family's religious observance as being "somewhere between Orthodox and Conservative. We observe all the holidays. My father [Murray] goes to synagogue every Saturday. We try to maintain a fair amount of our Judaism. Both my mom [Elaine] and my dad are Jewish.

"They're waiting for me to find a nice Jewish girl," he smiled. "That's my next plan. I'm not ready, but I'm still looking. I go back home for the Jewish holidays, it's always nice to go to synagogue and do little things that help you remember."

Pecker is aware of several other players in pro hockey who are Jewish: "The Henrich brothers, Adam and Michael. I played with Michael in Israel at the Maccabiah Games a long time ago. I'm a very good friend of Eric Himelfarb and I played last year with [David] Hymovitz. For Passover we went to a few seders in Binghamton when we played together for a while.

"There are not many of us so we connect because we know each other. It's nice."

It would be even nicer if this first-class mensch could snap out of his scoring slump.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH and BEVERLY KRAFT

Beverly: One of the more interesting weekend tournaments is the Lederer Memorial Teams, an annual invitational event for six to eight teams held at the Young Chelsea Bridge Club in London, England. What makes it so interesting, apart from the top-calibre field and prestige, is the format, a round robin using a combination of IMPs and point-a-board scoring, converted to victory points. This means that while the size of a swing is important for the IMP element, simply winning a board by any margin is also significant. There can be changing strategy involved, based on the individual's perception of how the match is going and there is always something "extra" to consider beyond the basic making and breaking of a particular contract. A somewhat risky play for an overtrick might be justified in some circumstances but not in others.

Eric: Canadian teams participated in 2003 and 2004 with modest success, and added to our country's reputation as goodwill ambassadors for the game. The 2004 event was won by a young Irish team – Tom Hanlon, Hugh McGann, Tommy Garvey and John Carroll – whose success in London was the springboard to the strongest-ever showing by an Irish team in an Olympiad shortly thereafter (reaching the knockout stage). Today's deal, from the critical final round of the 2005 Lederer, earned the legendary Zia Mahmood the prize for the best played hand of the weekend.

Beverly: There were two matches in the final round that could determine the outcome, with Ireland enjoying an 8 VP lead. At three of those four tables, N/S reached 7♦ after E/W had overcalled one of a minor with 3♠, and East had raised to 4♠ over an improvised negative double by North.

The declarers – Phil King, Tom Townsend and Zia – were all treated to the opening lead of the ♦Q. They won in dummy, discarding a heart, and all played to set up the clubs without touching trumps. When West followed to the third club, they had to ruff with dummy's ♦K to reach the critical point in the play.

King and Townsend both played a diamond to the ace, crossed to dummy's ♥A, and led a trump to the 10. Their line would have worked had the ♦A been singleton in the West hand or tripleton in the East hand, but had to fail on the actual lie of the cards.

Eric: After ruffing the third club with the ♦K, Zia broke ranks with his counterparts by leading a trump to his eight, taking a very deep finesse. When the eight held, he went to dummy with the ♥A to lead a second trump, covering East's card economically. With no trump loser, Zia made his grand slam where his counterparts had failed, but his team did not win the tournament, falling 2 VP short.

Beverly: As you might imagine, there was much discussion on VuGraph, on Bridge Base Online (which was doing a live broadcast on the Internet), and in the bar at the Young Chelsea Club afterwards, comparing the chances of the two main lines of play. Zia's line of finessing the ♦8 immediately is technically superior, winning in 21 cases, while the alternative line would succeed in 17. As Zia was the only declarer to take 13 tricks by going with the true odds, he was a worthy winner of the award for the best played hand.

Eric: While we're over in London to see the Queen (at least figuratively), we'd like to mention some books by English authors that we consider particularly readworthy:

- Play Bridge with Reese (Terence Reese): This classic had been out of print for many years but was reissued in 2002. It's the single book that helped us to see the light about how the game really works and we believe it can do the same for the modern generation. Sit at Reese's shoulder for 75 interesting deals and follow his thought processes as the play develops. If this book doesn't improve your game dramatically, you've reached your peak.
- Bridge Cardplay Made Easy (David Bird): At the other end of the spectrum is this beautifully written and organized beginner's text, which works equally well for formal classes or for an ambitious newcomer who wants to learn on his own. There are no advanced plays in the 200 pages, but all the basics are covered in 18 chapters ranging from Playing Your Winners to Clues from the Bidding. Easy on the eyes and fun to read, anyone can go from nowhere to competent in a week. And we're hard markers.
- Expert Defence (Raymond Brock): We are partial to books on this subject and this one is a gem. Chapter titles include The Strategy of Defence, Before You See Dummy, Partnership Co-operation, Expert Technique, Losing Options and Masterclass. The style is pithy and Reese-like and the author does not ignore uncomfortable subtleties.
- Expert Tuition for Tournament Bridge (Raymond and Sally Brock): The authors take you through a brutally frank post mortem of a first-class 64-board knockout match, played in eight segments. In fact, this is the same technique we use in our coaching program – a detailed discussion of what was and what could have been. It's a version of the book we intend to write when we can sit still long enough. You'll not only enjoy it thoroughly, but you'll also learn how you should best use your time away from the bridge table.

ISRAELI BANK SEEKS A GOVERNOR: U.S. financier Stanley Fischer arrived in Israel to be considered for governor of the Bank of Israel, Israel's central bank. "I am happy about the decision to nominate me, and hope I can make good on the expectations and contribute to the Israeli economy," Fischer, the vice-chair of Citigroup, told reporters in Hebrew after landing in Tel Aviv recently. If he gets the job, Fischer, 61, would have to become an Israeli citizen. [Israel photos]

SPAGHETTI SQUASH PRIMAVERA

- 1 large spaghetti squash (3 lbs.)
- 1/2 cup scallions, minced
- 2 cups broccoli flowerets
- 3 tblsps. olive oil
- 1/2 lb. carrots, cut in 1" pieces
- 3 cups tomato sauce
- 1 zucchini squash
- salt & pepper to taste

Bake spaghetti squash in a preheated 350°F oven, 1 hr. 15 mins. or until it can be pierced easily with a fork; let stand for 15 mins. and halve lengthwise. Remove seeds and scrape 'strands' into large bowl with a fork. Sauté broccoli, carrots, zucchini and scallions in a large skillet, stirring, until softened. Add salt and pepper to taste. Add tomato sauce to the vegetable mixture and toss with the spaghetti squash. Transfer to a serving dish. Serve the dish warm or at room temperature.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Can you sue for bad advice? In the specialized marketplace we operate in, we are all dependent on the advice of others, be they accountants, lawyers, plumbers, doctors or rabbis.

But what if that advice turns out to be wrong, causing you financial loss? Offering well-intentioned advice is a wonderful mitzvah, but unless you're eminently qualified to do so while also looking out for the best interests of your "client," it's best to remain quiet.

Jewish teachings have long recognized that there is an inherent conflict of interest in the advisory role. The advisor is interested in enriching himself while the client is interested in getting solid unbiased advice. This in and of itself does not present a moral issue, provided the advisor has a "fear of God" that engenders an ethical sensitivity, which will ensure that the advisor puts the client's interests first and tries to eliminate all known biases.

While no one likes to pay for poor service, there are times when you must do just that. Jewish law looks at two main criteria in assessing liability: the professional credentials of the advisor and whether services were rendered free of charge. Additionally, as a general rule, liability is only imposed if a loss is due to an error of competence that should and could have been foreseen by a professional advisor. Errors of judgement or analysis that do not involve clear incompetence would not be actionable. Thus, an accountant dispensing tax advice that is against the law would be liable for any penalties incurred. The claims of ignorance are just not credible. However, that same accountant who suggests an investment that goes awry would not be liable for losses incurred, assuming there was no negligence involved.

Interestingly, Jewish law posits that an expert – meaning a licensed professional – is to be held less accountable than a layperson for any errors caused. And while a professional is liable if he is being paid for his services, services offered on a pro bono basis free the advisor from potential lawsuits. You get what you pay for. However, the exact same advice offered by a non-licensed professional would incur a legal obligation to compensate for direct financial losses even if it were offered gratis. Only if non-professionals make it perfectly clear that their advice should not be relied upon can they absolve themselves of payment.

The tsunami's valuable lesson

By AVRUM ROSWENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The tsunami disaster elicited an organic, swift and generous response from the world community. Some $4 billion, together with a glut of relief items and international offers of volunteerism, has been collected to assist the victims of the crisis.

Clearly, humankind felt the grief of the calamity's victims and instinctively realized how to participate in alleviating some of their suffering.

So why the difference between the world's response to the tsunami – a full-blown and generous one – and its tightfisted and minimal role during the Holocaust and today, on behalf of the people of Darfur, Sudan?

Why does most of the world – including the Jewish people – not act in an equally big-hearted manner, given the sadism being perpetrated today by the Sudanese government toward many of its men, women and children? Why did humanity not rise up during World War II and frequently react to the daily massacres of Jews, Gypsies, homosexuals and countless innocent nationals from eastern Europe?

Perhaps if we can see the differences between these responses, we might be able to create guiding principles that would compel us to extinguish future world upheavals.

The response to the tsunami was aggressive, immediate and inclusive, because the unwritten guidelines for the public were clear: send money and relief items, and if there is use for your skills and expertise, volunteer opportunities are available.

The public's intuition after the tsunami sensed what was needed, just as we would if a child, God forbid, was hurt on a baseball field. In essence, those who took action said: "I am confounded by the deep cuts and suddenness of this natural disaster. I have the means and understanding to help – so I will."

Knowing that there was little personal risk involved accentuated our reaction to the nations thumped and gulped by the Indian Ocean.

Such clear rules, however, were not as obvious during the Holocaust and Sudan. Money was required, and partially raised, to help the victims and refugees of both these conflicts, but much more was needed to stop the wars themselves, as opposed to repairing infrastructure destroyed by the waves that hit the shores of Southeast Asia and eastern Africa.

What was required was the encouragement and direction of bold and sturdy leaders, and instructions to all peoples to create a concerted and strategic plan of action – including civil disobedience, dramatic and gutsy protests and even the creation of private armies (a current consideration for Sudan).

It would seem that education on effective ways to daringly assist our sisters and brothers who are affected by the treachery of war is essential. We need to be taught how to apply [illegible] to malevolent governments in an organized and capable way, as the tenacity of their actions do not elicit an intuitive response. Martin Luther King Jr. understood this and, therefore, taught black Americans how to become activists by giving them (non-violent) tools to fight the bullwhips of vicious white intimidators and cowards.

In the case of the Jewish people, Holocaust education and the millions of dollars invested in it needs to be tweaked and upgraded to focus not only on awareness, but also on activist workshops based on the Jewish imperative to embrace the suffering, even if we're called upon to be their shield of defence.

The tsunami, through the incalculable suffering it has wrought, can teach us a much-needed lesson: clarity during a disaster or war and a well thought-out menu of responses can be effective in stymieing hatred and senseless brutality.

The tsunami pointed out the benefit of knowing the rules. Let's learn from it.

Pettigrew to visit Middle East

Itinerary includes four countries and Palestinian territories

OTTAWA — Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew is heading to the Middle East, where he is scheduled to hold talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, The CJN learned Monday morning.

The Feb. 6-11 trip will take Pettigrew to Jordan, Israel, Syria, the Palestinian territories and Lebanon.

In Amman, he will attend the opening of a conference on Arab governance, sponsored by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

He then heads briefly to Israel, and after that to Syria for talks with President Bashar al-Assad.

On Feb. 9, he is slated to meet with Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.

Scheduled for the next two days in Israel are meetings with Sharon, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, a tour of Yad Vashem and an address to the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce.

Sources say he may also tour parts of the country by helicopter.

Three MPs will accompany Pettigrew: Francine Lalonde of the Bloc Québécois; Bill Casey of the Conservative party and Alexa McDonough of the NDP.

More details will appear in next week's CJN.

Holocaust remembered, but anti-Semitism not understood

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff reporter

OSWIECIM, Poland — Until recently, it would have been difficult to imagine 27 heads of state and dignitaries from 13 countries gathered at Auschwitz-Birkenau in the bitter cold while Israeli soldiers stood at attention with their blue and white flags.

On Jan. 27, dignitaries and survivors assembled at several ceremonies to mark the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

In the morning before proceeding to the grounds of the concentration and death camp where 1.5 million people, mainly Jews, were killed, leaders spoke at the Juliusz Slowackiego Theatre in Krakow.

Comment

Who could have pictured Dick Cheney, the vice-president of the United States, at a theatre in Poland, paying tribute to the heroism of Red Army soldiers?

Or that President Viktor Yushchenko of Ukraine, a country that many Jewish survivors remember with fear, would vow to fight anti-Semitism in his own country as long as he lives. And that Yushchenko, a president struggling against contemporary Russian involvement, would, in a speech to an audience that included Russian President Vladimir Putin, refer to his country's suffering during the

126,000 See Modigliani

TORONTO — An Art Gallery of Ontario exhibit of works by Italian Jewish artist Amedeo Modigliani, who died in poverty in 1920 at age 36, attracted 126,000 visitors to its 13-week run that ended Jan. 23. Organized by the Jewish Museum in New York, where it was first shown, it featured 87 works, mostly on loan from galleries in New York and London. Attendance was lower than for the AGO's Turner, Whistler, Monet show, which drew 210,000 visitors last year.

PM Pushed on Darfur

VANCOUVER — To mark last week's 60th anniversary of Auschwitz's liberation, Canadian Jewish Congress, with support from the Darfur Association of Canada, wrote Prime Minister Paul Martin to urge him to follow through on his commitments to help end the crisis in Darfur, Sudan. Since 2003, government-backed Arab militias have killed thousands of Africans in the area.

WORLD

Deal for Camp Guard

DAYTON, Ohio — A man living in Butler Township near Dayton, Ohio, has been stripped of his U.S. citizenship for his World War II-era activities, but will not be deported. The deal involving Ildefonsas Bucmys, 84, was filed in a U.S. court earlier this month. In exchange for dropping the lawsuit that the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations filed against Bucmys in 2002 alleging that he failed to disclose his role as a prison guard at Majdanek on his immigration application, he agreed to testify against anyone who also may have served at the death camp in 1943.

Gay Victims Recalled

ROME — A monument to gays and lesbians murdered by the Nazis was unveiled last week at the Risiera di San Sabba near Trieste, the only Nazi death camp on Italian soil. Sponsored by a gay group with support of local authorities, the pink stone triangle atop a black marble pedestal symbolizes the pink triangles gay prisoners were forced to wear.

Letter Slurs Jews

MOSCOW — Russian Jewish leaders last week criticized a letter calling on the state to probe and possibly ban all Jewish groups in Russia as extremist. The 10-page document, posted last month on the website of newspaper Pravoslavnaya – the Orthodox Rus – contains a list of anti-Semitic slurs common in ultra-nationalist circles, blaming Jews and Judaism for plotting to destroy the Russian people. Some 500 public figures signed the letter, including 19 deputies of the State Duma from three parties who later rescinded their support. The Russian government did not comment on the letter.

Anti-Semitism on the Rise in Britain

LONDON — Prosecutions for religious hate crimes against British Jews are up, new figures show.

The Crown Prosecution Service said five cases came to court from April 2003 to March 2004, and there had been just one such prosecution the previous year. But Jewish community leaders said the figures were misleading because most anti-Semitic incidents,which have risen steeply in recent years, don't result in arrests.

Indeed, a new Israeli government report found the number of violent anti-Semitic acts jumped dramatically in Britain last year. Violent attacks against Jews and Jewish property jumped from 55 to 77 incidents in 2004, according to figures published last week in a report by the Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism, a joint project of the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The incidents included physical harassment, desecration of shuls and cemeteries, threats and propaganda. In France, there were 96 incidents, the same as in 2003, the forum said. The report, based on data collected by governments and Jewish groups, found a rise in anti-Semitic acts in Europe in 2004, most said to be carried out by Muslims.

Second-last Jew Dies

KABUL — Yitzhak Levi, 80, one of Afghanistan's last two Jews, died last week in Kabul from complications related to diabetes. His death leaves one Jew in Afghanistan, Zevulun Simantov, 45, who lived with Levi in Kabul's synagogue. The two had a falling out before the U.S. invasion of the country, with Levi saying Simantov stole a sefer Torah. The Taliban arrested and tortured both men and confiscated the scroll. Levi's family in Israel hopes to take his remains for burial there. After the U.S. invasion, Jewish groups offered to help Levi emigrate, but he refused. Most Afghan Jews left after Israel's creation or during later unrest in their country.

OU Kiddush Club Ban

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union is telling rabbis to outlaw Shabbat "kiddush clubs," in which participants skip the Haftorah reading to drink, starting at services Feb. 5. The OU move is part of a campaign to reduce the glorification of liquor.

Shoah poll reveals gaps in Canadians' knowledge

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

A new survey showing a significant level of ignorance about Jews being the main victims of Nazism and how many Jews were killed in the Holocaust points to the need for more extensive education about World War II, says the director of the organization that commissioned the poll.

The survey of 2,021 Canadians was conducted by Environics Research Group at the end of December and early January and released by the Association of Canadian Studies (ACS) last week to coincide with the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. It showed that close to one-third of Canadians – 29 per cent – believe that non-Jews were the principal victims of Nazism.

And only 40 per cent of Canadians knew the correct answer of six million or more when asked about how many Jews were killed by the Nazis.

Some 16 per cent of Canadians put the number of Jewish victims at fewer than a million.

The survey's margin of error was plus or minus 3.5 per cent, 19 times out of 20.

"I was disappointed by the 'principal victims' figure because it was a closed question [in which respondents selected an answer from several options]," ACS executive director Jack Jedwab told The CJN last week. "Almost 30 per cent represents an important segment of Canadians."

At a press conference held in conjunction with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, Jedwab and MHMC executive director Ann Ungar both described the poll's findings as "mixed."

On the one hand, Jedwab said, it showed that 70 per cent of Canadians know that Jews were the Nazis' main victims.

On the other hand, less than half of that 70 per cent knew that Jewish victims numbered six million or more, Jedwab said, referring to cross-tabulated figures from both questions.

"This is important to know, since it shows that there is a fragmentation of knowledge," Jedwab said. "People get pieces of information, but they do not put the whole picture together."

Jedwab said he was "quite shocked" when he heard about an 18-year-old Quebec student who toured the MHMC's Holocaust Museum and admitted that he had previously never even heard of Adolf Hitler.

More than anything, Jedwab said, the poll results point to the need for making the study of World War II – and in that context, the Holocaust – mandatory and more detailed for all Canadian students.

"There is just this lack of exposure," Jedwab said.

This appeared to be especially true in Quebec, where the poll showed that 35 per cent of Quebecers – more than in any other province – believe that non-Jews (mostly Poles) were the Nazis' main victims.

Yet, 44 per cent of Quebecers – also more than in any other province – knew the numbers of Jews killed by the Nazis was six million or "greater."

Jedwab postulated that the higher level of ignorance in Quebec about Jews being Nazism's main victims could be attributable to the Quebec school system, which deals less with World War II, and Quebec's historically "ambiguous" role in the war, than other provinces.

Moreover, Jedwab suggested, Quebecers may be less exposed to information about World War II and the Holocaust than other Canadians.

A breakdown of the poll numbers shows some other surprises.

On the "principal victims" question, the age of respondents and where they lived did not seem to matter as much as their level of education. Only 57 per cent of Canadians without a high school diploma knew that Jews were the main victims of Nazis, compared to 72 per cent with a university degree.

On the question about the number of Jews killed by Nazis, both income and education seemed to play an "important role" in the findings, Jedwab said.

Only 35 per cent of Canadians with incomes of less than $20,000, and 25 per cent of Canadians without a high school diploma, thought the number of Jews killed was six million or "greater."

By contrast, 50 per cent of Canadians earning $80,000 or more and 53 per cent of Canadians with university degrees knew the correct number.

The results of the poll should make World War II and Holocaust education a front-burner priority, both Jedwab and Ungar said.

The Museum on the Seam

From the editor's desk

Last December, I spent five days in Israel as the guest of the Ministry of Tourism. My itinerary consisted mainly of visiting places and people I had not seen or met before. This column is the fourth in a series that chronicles some of places I saw and people I met for the first time.

In the years from 1948 to 1967, Jerusalem was a divided city. A no-man's land of barbed wire and concrete physically separated west Jerusalem from east Jerusalem. It also separated west Jerusalem from the road to Mount Scopus, on which were Hebrew University and Hadassah Hospital, and the road to the Mount of Olives, one of the oldest Jewish burial ground in the country. To the west of no-man's land was Israel. To the east was Jordan.

But the wire and concrete divide came down in the Six Day War. The house that served as a military outpost for the nascent Jewish state along that ugly dividing line, not far from the Mandelbaum Gate – the only crossing point from 1948 to 1967 for diplomats and tourists along the Israel-Jordan border, is now a museum. It takes its name from its location. It is called The Museum on the Seam.

Reminders of the museum's hard history help identify the building. Bullet marks scar the golden stones of its exterior and iron gun slits still cover the original windows. But once inside, the visitor encounters different scarring marks.

Raphie Etgar, the museum's founder, director and curator describes Museum on the Seam as "the first socio-political museum in Israel. It asks political and social questions of its visitors." But Etgar was understating the effect. The museum does more than ask. It stops the visitor in his tracks like a fist hitting the solar plexus.

The displays in the museum deal with themes of dialogue, understanding and coexistence. It is a stunning multi-media educational experience of photography, archival films and contemporary art.

The exhibits aim at the deepest parts of the feeling mind and the knowing heart. There is no sugar-coating of messages, nor is there any muting of raw emotion. At times gut-wrenching, at times searing, but never less than jarring and very intense, the museum makes the visitor think about conflict between peoples. It's focus is not only the Arab-Israeli conflict; rather it encompasses conflict around the globe.

Etgar, a successful designer and graphic artist, began the museum five years ago. It was the combined initiative of the Jerusalem Foundation, the Von Holzbrinck family from Germany and himself. It is funded entirely by private donors. "Ironically," Etgar points out sadly, "all the donors are non-Jewish."

The museum has a staff of six people and can accommodate about 30 visitors at one time. In its first year, approximately 4,000 people visited. Last year, the figure grew to more than 13,000. Etgar is currently trying to expand the building by acquiring the neighbouring house.

"The purpose of the museum," he says quite boldly,"is to save humanity. And yet the Jewish world does not really know about it. We are trying to guide a new generation. Soldiers, students and children are his key audience."

The museum is an important educational instrument of the army, according to Etgar. Indeed, while I was in the museum, a large group of young soldiers toured the museum as well, which culminated in animated discussions on the rooftop patio led by a museum guide and their unit leader.

"Every border policeman (mishmar hagvul) must go through the museum," Etgar said, "and they are in the front lines protecting against terrorist infiltrations."

Etgar is an articulate, thoughtful idealist who believes deeply that "art can influence the mind of public opinion." He was once a tank commander. His life experiences, therefore, have not been soft.

"Art and literature can make a contribution to our society where politicians have failed. It is time for artists to lend their talents and insights. Museums can change people. Even if it is just a drop in the ocean, it comforts me nevertheless. I pray that somebody will understand what we are trying to do here to help us develop even more artists."

One of the museum's projects is a travelling exhibition of large posters by diverse international artists, accompanied by panels of text by renowned thinkers and dignitaries. The giant exhibition explores themes of peace and environmental harmony. It is called "Coexistence." Thus far, it has travelled around the world to some 20 cities, including Belfast, Luxembourg, Sarajevo, Berne, Berlin, Cape Town and Washington. Some 17 more cities are on its future itinerary. Etgar would like to bring this remarkable exhibition to Canada.

In Hebrew, etgar means challenge. It is a fitting moniker for the curator director as it so aptly describes the nature of his life's work, which is also his and humanity's life's dream.

Tours of the museum are available in Hebrew, English, Arabic, French, German, Spanish and Russian. For an online insight into the exhibition, visit www.coexistence.art.museum. – MBD

Correction

We received an e-mail from the Toronto offices of Yad Vashem advising us that the photo on Page 1 of last week's CJN was of prisoners at Buchenwald and not Auschwitz-Birkenau. Our identification of the camp as Auschwitz was based on information from other texts. While the essential point of the editorial that accompanied the photo was not undermined or compromised, we apologize for incorrectly identifying the death camp. The editor

Survivors 'outraged' over CBC News Sunday

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TV show included appearance by anti-Zionist professor

A survivor of Auschwitz who was interviewed by CBC Television says she feels "betrayed" by the broadcaster because the segment included an interview with a notorious American anti-Zionist and unremitting critic of Holocaust reparations.

Even though Judy Cohen of Toronto was invited back to CBC News Sunday this past weekend to rebut the remarks of the controversial Norman Finkelstein, the whole episode has left a bad taste.

"I think it's the end of the matter," Cohen told The CJN as she was preparing her remarks for this past Sunday's show. "But why have something controversial about Auschwitz, of all times, when you're trying to have a serious discussion about the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz?"

Cohen, a well-known Holocaust educator, and two other local Auschwitz survivors, Elizabeth de Jong and Max Eisen, appeared on CBC News Sunday Jan. 23 to talk about their wartime memories as part of the broadcaster's coverage of the Auschwitz anniversary.

They say that unbeknownst to them, a debate then followed between Finkelstein and University of Toronto historian and Holocaust expert Michael Marrus on what forms Holocaust commemoration should take.

"They kept that secret from us," Cohen said.

In a letter to the CBC, Cohen said that "had we known this, we would have refused to appear on your show."

The Jewish son of survivors himself and a darling of the far-left, Finkelstein is a U.S. political science professor and author. He is also a much-reviled figure among most of the North American Jewish establishment, whom he accuses of ruthlessly exploiting the Holocaust for political and financial gain, and of using it to justify Israel's treatment of Palestinians.

His book, The Holocaust Industry, accuses elite Jewish "hucksters" and "frauds" of "shaking down" Germany for reparations.

In her letter, Cohen said she and the two other survivors appeared on the show "in good faith" but are now "outraged and wonder why Evan Solomon, the host of the show, did not refuse to do this? Why did you go along with this travesty or at least warn us in advance?"

Finkelstein, she went on, has a "well-known contempt of remembrance and commemoration of our nightmarish experiences."

Cohen said she took particular offense at Finkelstein's remark that "there are now more Holocaust museums in the United States than there are Burger Kings. And it is only a matter of time that there are more Holocaust museums than there are McDonalds."

She wondered: "Can anyone trivialize more the commemorations of the greatest Jewish and human tragedy in the 20th century than this outrageous, stupid remark? And the host let it pass unchallenged."

The letter goes on: "Never should you have combined our remembrances with the likes of Norman Finkelstein. Never. Your insult is unforgivable and particularly unworthy of the CBC.

"We are deeply offended and so are many of the people who called us."

In his comments, which are posted on the show's website, Finkelstein explains his book's argument: That "the Nazi Holocaust has been exploited, mainly by American Jewish elites, American Jewish organizations for political and financial gain. Specifically, the Nazi Holocaust has been used as a club to silence criticism of the State of Israel.

"Most recently it takes the form of a new so called anti-Semitism which in actuality is non-existent, but there is a claim of new anti-Semitism, a resurgence of a 1930's style of anti-Semitism, and that is just being used, exploited to silence critics of the Israeli repression in the occupied territories."

He went on to wonder "whether it is time to commemorate the suffering of others."

Canadian Jewish Congress also took the CBC to task. In a letter, CJC said Finkelstein, "true to form, was vulgar and offensive," and that his appearance was "ill-conceived."

Marrus told The CJN he was aware Finkelstein would be on the show, but agreed to appear anyway.

"I regret they had him. I told them it wasn't a good idea. But if I didn't do it, he might have appeared by himself or with somebody who couldn't stand up to him. It was a judgment call."

Once Finkelstein has a platform, "it's important to oppose his views," Marrus said. He attributed Finkelstein's appearance to "showbiz, I'm afraid."

Having Finkelstein on the show was "a programming decision," Stuart Coxe, executive producer of CBC News Sunday, told The CJN. "In the context of the debate, it was about the issue of the relative status of grief and memorials. So in that respect, it was suitable."

However, Coxe added, the CBC doesn't endorse Finkelstein's views, and the offence he caused was "inadvertent."

"The last thing we and Evan Solomon wanted to do is cause offense to Holocaust survivors." He said Cohen was invited back on the show "out of respect for her and survivors, and to express her views."

The CJN was unable to reach Solomon for comment.

Teen sues federal government over passport flap

Seeks to have document list Jerusalem, Israel as birthplace

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A Toronto teenager is taking the federal government to court over Ottawa's policy of denying Canadian citizens born in Jerusalem the right to designate Israel as their country of birth on their passports.

Eliyahu Yehoshua Veffer's passport says he was born in Jerusalem 17 years ago, but omits mention of Israel.

"I'm proud to have been born in Israel," Veffer, a Grade 11 student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, told The CJN. "I don't see why I can't have Israel on my passport."

Veffer, whose father is Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, spiritual leader of the Village Shul, was brought to Canada by his parents six years ago. He's a citizen of both Canada and Israel, and has an Israeli passport.

He's offended at a Canadian policy that he feels denies his heritage.

"As the government sees it, I don't have a birthplace," he says.

B'nai Brith Canada says there are many Canadians like Veffer – victims of a foreign policy that regards Jerusalem as disputed territory, along with other lands captured by Israel after the 1967 Six Day War.

Veffer's lawyer last week filed an application for a judicial review of the policy, which he calls discriminatory and politically driven.

Winnipeg-based David Matas, B'nai Brith Canada's senior legal counsel, says the policy unfairly singles Israel out when there are other places in the world considered disputed territory.

"What about a person born in Kashmir or Tibet?" he asked.

Matas wants Ottawa to get rid of the policy, or for the Federal Court to force the government to change it. He said a challenge under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is one possible course of action.

Matas said the directive is one-sided because it applies only to those born in Jerusalem after the creation of the State of Israel on May 18, 1948.

"Anyone born before that in Jerusalem has a choice," he explained. "Their place of birth on their passport can be 'Jerusalem' or 'Palestine.'

"It's blatant discrimination. Why can you have 'Palestine' but not 'Israel?'"

He said his client might be satisfied with the lone designation of Israel as his birthplace. "At least that would remove the inequity."

Matas said many immigration and border officials in other countries consider passports without a country of birth to be incomplete, and their holders are subjected to added scrutiny.

"People are hassled all the time. There have been a lot of problems."

Reacting to the challenge, the foreign affairs department provided the following statement to The CJN:

"The Canadian government does allow the inscription of Jerusalem as a place of birth on Canadian passports. However, Canada considers that the status of Jerusalem can be resolved only as part of a general settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict..

"Consequently, neither 'Jerusalem, Israel' nor 'Jerusalem, Palestine' may be inscribed as place of birth in Canadian passports.

"The government of Canada, at this time, is not considering changing its policy on the inscription of Jerusalem as place of birth in Canadian passports.

"Inscriptions such as 'Jerusalem, Israel' would be contrary to Canada's Middle East policy and to our policy regarding recognition as well as to our obligations under international law, including relevant UN Security Council resolutions."

While the statement says nothing about the lone designation of "Palestine," a Dec. 21, 2004 letter from the Passport Office to Veffer's Toronto lawyer does.

The letter, signed by Nick Wise, acting chief executive officer of the Passport Office, says Canada "has established that designation for individuals born in Jerusalem be indicated as Jerusalem alone and in full in the Canadian passport."

There is, however, "one exception for individuals born before May 14, 1948. Upon request, 'Palestine' may be written instead of 'Jerusalem.'"

To Matas, that underscores his argument of discrimination.

The letter also explained that place of birth on Canadian passports is determined by the Geneva-based International Organization for Standardization, which maintains country lists for the International Civil Aviation Organization, a United Nations agency that "establishes the standards for international travel documents."

Matas said it's not clear from the letter whether Canada determines its own policy or whether it follows rules set by international agencies.

He said the United States, and probably the European Union, employ the same policy as Canada.

A U.S. law passed in 2003 says that an American citizen born in Jerusalem may have Israel listed in their passport as their place of birth. At the time, the White House said it would interpret the law's section on Jerusalem as "advisory."

Last August, a court in Washington, D.C. dismissed lawsuits from two American-Israeli couples who wanted Israel designated as the country of birth on the passports of their Jerusalem-born children.

The court said it did not have jurisdiction over the case since the designation of Israel on a passport was a political matter.

It also said the plaintiffs "suffered no injury."

However, the judge's decision had political overtones. She said the plaintiffs' arguments "border on the disingenuous."

The status of Jerusalem, the judge stated, "is without question one of the most sensitive foreign policy issues to have confronted the world in recent years...To argue that this is merely a routine administrative issue ignores the last 50 to 60 years of violence in the Middle East. The question at hand involves the authority to recognize sovereigns and conduct foreign policy, not the bureaucratic procedures for issuance of passports."

Dry Bones
WE IRAQIS RISKED OUR LIVES TO VOTE!
WITH HOPE THAT SOMEDAY WE WILL BE A GREAT DEMOCRACY LIKE THE U.S.!
AND THEN?!
AND THEN, MY SON...
...WE'LL ALL BE TOO LAZY TO BOTHER TO VOTE!

Commendable courage

It is too early to say history has turned. But it is not too early to say a historic event has occurred. As of this writing, observers suggest that 65 to 70 per cent of eligible Iraqi voters took part Sunday in the country's first national elections in more than 50 years. More than half of the women of Iraq voted.

The significance of the event cannot be overstated. And the courage of the voters cannot be sufficiently commended. The terrorists did not equivocate in defining their aims. In leaflets distributed in Baghdad they boasted they would "wash the streets of Baghdad with the voters' blood. To those of you who think you can vote and then run away, we will shadow you and catch you and we will cut off your heads and the heads of your children."

Even as Iraqis were lining up to vote, suicide bombers struck 16 times, killing more than 40 people. But clearly, the majority of Iraqis were not cowed by the terrorists. The majority will to build the country anew was stronger than the adversary's desire to prevent it.

Despite the many candidates and ethnicities vying for election, there were, in truth, only two contending sides. The terrorists themselves made that very plain when Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the acknowledged head of the Al Qaeda faction in Iraq, issued the following statement early last week: "We have declared an all-out war on this evil principle of democracy and those who follow this ideology."

Thus the voters were really left with one choice: democracy or terrorocracy. Iraqis chose democracy.

Large numbers turned out to vote and the elections took hold. Whether democracy has taken root remains to be seen. The election was only the first step. A long journey remains. It is not yet clear who will form the government. Who will be the president and the prime minister? What will be the constituent makeup of a parliament? Who will write the constitution? What will be its division of powers? But there is no denying the demonstration last Sunday by the ordinary Iraqis standing in line to vote was a remarkable display of courage and determination.

There is also no denying that the successful elections were also a blow to the network of global terrorists who, despite their brutality, were impotent against the stronger force of people of good will wanting to live in freedom.

The reflexive anti-Americans who harbour only contempt for Washington and see nothing good in the efforts of George W. Bush's administration will find it difficult to gainsay Sunday's achievement in Iraq, although undoubtedly they will try.

The violence in Iraq is not nearing its end. The terrorists will target the newly elected as surely as they targeted the voters. But they cannot now undo what the voters have done – choose a life under the rule of law rather than under the rule of tyranny.

The regimes of other countries in the area are sure to take notice. As will their people, potential first-time voters, too.

More on Gerber: Con I

Jean M. Gerber displays a complete lack of understanding of the Arab-Israeli conflict ("Messianic settlers put all of Israel at risk," CJN, Jan. 20).

The Arabs are not interested in a two-state solution; rather in one state, an Arab state called Palestine, where Jews will be second-class citizens at best.

Shortly after the Six Day War, the whole country was behind the idea of living in places where Judaism and Israel were born. It is only recently that the Arab states in their manipulative ways sought to delegitimize the whole idea that Jews had any connection to the land.

Even if Israel pulls out of all the towns and villages (what she calls "settlements"), the Arabs will find other excuses for not making peace with Israel.

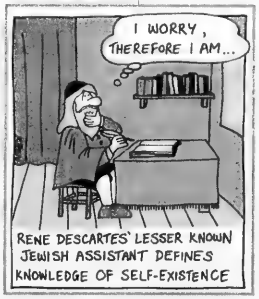
Con II

I believe Jean Gerber has her principles confused. She opposes Jewish settlement in Gaza because it was a Philistine city. The implied principle is that regions of the land of Canaan settled by the Philistines are forbidden to Jewish settlement. Extending the principle would require the evacuation of Jews from the other Philistine cities of Ashdod, Ashkelon, Kiryat Gat, Ekron and Tel Qasile/Tel-Aviv.

The Philistines, as a distinct group, lasted 100 to 150 years. This means that for most of Gaza's history, it was not Philistine. If Gaza was not predominantly Philistine in its long history, then Gerber must find some other principle to forbid Jewish settlement there.



Gerber calls Jewish settlement of Judea imperialistic. Imperialism, however, is the taking and exploiting of someone else's land. Since when is Judea someone else's land? By calling Judea and Samaria the "West Bank," she legitimizes Jordan's illegal annexation in 1949 of the hill country of western Palestine. Jordan was the first to call these territories the West Bank. It is therefore illegitimate to even use that term for Judea and Samaria.

Hence, Gerber's principles forbid Jewish settlement in Judea and Samaria because that would constitute imperialism, and she would forbid Jews to settle in the coastal plain, because that was Philistine territory.

I appeal to Gerber to find more defensible principles on which to base a Judenrein Palestine.

Con III

The Green Line – Israel's border before the Six Day War – cuts through Jerusalem and parallels the Mediterranean coast, leaving Israel with a strip of land less than 10 miles wide in spots, on which 80 per cent of the population live. Without the security buffer of the West Bank, how would Jean Gerber intend that the citizens of that area be defended when this distance is well within Qassam rocket range?

Gerber writes that the settlers "justify it all with calls for the God-given right to live in some imaginary biblical Land of Israel." Either we have a right to live in the Land of Israel or we don't! If the Torah and the divine right for Jews to live in Israel are discounted, then how can you support Jews living in any part of Israel?

Gerber goes to great lengths to blacken the settlers because of a few who have lashed out under the intolerable stress they bear. The truth is that none of the wars were of their making. These settlers are pioneers who risk themselves and their children to build a defensible Jewish homeland. And those who live in the comfort of North America should stop sitting on the sidelines taking pot shots at those who risk their lives, and instead work toward strengthening the state and securing it for all Jews.

Bracha Mirsky
Thornhill, Ont.

Con IV

Everyone is entitled to an opinion, but the opinion expressed by Jean Gerber could only be regarded as judgmental and anti-Israel.

The settlements that Gerber objects to were the brainchild of the governments of Israel. Jews who were attuned to the land responded by settling the land and raising their children according to the laws of the Bible.

It is the Arab world that refuses to accept the reality of Israel. If the Arab world could accept the reality of Israel, there would long ago have been a palpable, realistic peace.

We believe, if taken to a vote, Jews in general and Israel in particular would support these magnificent heroes of Israel – the settlers.

Isadore and Batya Eisen

Pro I

As a longtime resident of Israel, I congratulate Jean Gerber for her astute and courageous article. It was like a breath of fresh air in a Diaspora atmosphere where love for Israel blinds many to the reality that, also from within, the Jewish State faces a serious threat to its very existence.

'We must vow never to forget'

Prime Minister Paul Martin issued this statement, in Ottawa, on the day preceeding the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

As commemoration activities unfold in Poland tomorrow, let us remember that when the Soviet Red Army freed Auschwitz, it marked more than the liberation of the most notorious of concentration camps. It marked the beginning of the end of the Holocaust – a time in our history of intolerable cruelty which resulted in the systematic murder of millions of people, an overwhelming majority of them Jews.

Canada takes pride in our fight against fascism and our role in liberating those who suffered under its tyranny during the Holocaust. As the candles are lit at the monument to the victims of fascism in Birkenau tomorrow, we must vow never to forget this dark chapter in history. By being vigilant in the defence of our common humanity in the future we honour the lessons of the past. While we cannot erase the horrible suffering that took place at Auschwitz and other concentration camps, we can and do honour both those who lost their lives and those who survived.

The commemoration ceremony reminds us that we must reflect on the unspeakable atrocities inflicted in the camps and on the constant need to combat hatred and evil. This reflection serves to renew our collective commitment to promoting respect for human rights worldwide.

'A scream seeks to burst from the depth of our soul'

This is the address given by the president of the State of Israel, Moshe Katsav, at the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, which took place in Poland on Jan. 27.

We have come today to Birkenau to commemorate the millions who were murdered in Auschwitz and throughout Europe and to give honour to the victims and the survivors of the Shoah. I wish to thank the president of Poland, Mr. Aleksander Kwasniewski, for his invitation to the event marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

I wish to thank the Allies – the Red Army, which liberated Auschwitz, the United States of America, which sent its army to Europe to liberate its peoples, Great Britain, whose courage served as an example of heroic determination, the undergrounds in occupied Europe and the one and a half million Jewish fighters who fought against the Nazi menace.

Excellencies, heads of state – the mind of man refuses to grasp the great horror which took place inside these fences. Auschwitz-Birkenau is the most horrendous crime scene in the history of humanity. Birkenau is the largest graveyard of the Jewish people. Here we are witness to the remnants of the gas chambers and the crematoria.

We see the barrracks, the fences, the guard towers, the final station of the railway tracks, which brought the condemned from the far corners of Europe to the burning ovens. It seems as if we can still hear the dead crying out.

Thousands of people, trembling from terror, pouring out from the train wagons by a satanic plan of modern technology. Day and night and with unfailing precision, the Germans conducted a genocide industry, a killing factory for the murder of our people in Europe.

This happened in Auschwitz-Birkenau, the capital of the death empire. It happened in Maidenek, in Treblinka, Sobibor, Chelmno, Belzec and many other sites of mass murder.

When I step on the earth of the death camps, awe and trembling seize me lest I tread on the ashes of the victims in Europe's soil. I fear lest the water running in Europe's rivers carries in it the blood of the Shoah dead.

Here in the heart of Auschwitz-Birkenau, a scream seeks to burst from the depth of our soul and yet there is a spark of pride. The Jewish people have arisen from the death camps' ashes, as a brand snatched from the burning fire. We have returned to our homeland.

Three hours flight from here, we have re-established our homeland, but not in time to shelter those who were murdered here. We are a determined and proud nation, which looks forward with great hope. Our strong ties with the nations whose heads are standing here today are a symbol of solace and a foundation of our security.

The Jewish people survived the destruction, suffering, exiles, expulsions and the greatest tragedy – the Shoah. Despite it all, we have returned to our homeland and we have built a modern, developed, democratic state, which has ingathered the Jewish people from the four corners of the earth. In all of human history, there has been no similar event.

My brothers and sisters, the martyrs of the Shoah, who were not able to join the State of Israel, world leaders have come to this place, which was your hell, in order to remember you. You are the lost citizens of our homeland.

Excellencies, kings, queens and presidents, leaders of European states – in Auschwitz-Birkenau more than one million Jews were slaughtered, all of them were sons and daughter of your lands, citizens of your countries.

We know that Europe was a land occupied by the German Nazi regime. But we also remember that in European countries there was rabid anti-Semitism, which left the Jews with no escape and without hope. The anti-Semitism was based on racism and hatred.

In Europe, the heart of civilization, a nation rose up against another nation, to annihilate it and wipe it off the face of the earth. The destruction was the work of a people which produced renowned scientists, musicians and philosophers. A multitude of nations knew of the murder but were indifferent.

The world knew about the destruction of the European Jewry but remained silent.

Opposition and hesitation of the Allies to bomb the death camps and to destroy the railways carrying the Jews to them claimed more victims from our people, and this, too, remains a mark on the forehead of humanity.

Sixty years after the Shoah, we witness a re-emergence of anti-Semitism in Europe. Is it possible that the deterrent power of the Shoah has weakened? The answer is in the hands of Europe's leaders. It is in the hands of the educators and the historians. It is in our hands.

On this day, on the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau, we feel closer than ever to the victims and the survivors. On this day, we are closer to human heritage, to mankind's morality, to the Divine command.

The victory over Nazism is the victory of humanity's values. It is the victory of morality and faith in mankind.

Beyond all differences of opinion, we are united in our memory of the horror and we share the moral lesson. We, the Jewish people, are bound by history to commemorate the Shoah and to light it with an eternal flame. This is demanded of us by our brothers and sisters, the victims of the Shoah, from their graves, from the killing pits, from the gas chambers and from the trains.

Humanity must pass on the awareness, the knowledge, the uniqueness and the lessons of the Holocaust from one generation to another.

World leaders must be aware that dangerous doctrines can again emerge in the world, false doctrines which are based on ignorance, on brainwashing, on incitement and hatred, on blindness, on deceit and falsification, on coercion and on base instincts, on the exploitation of democracy to achieve dictatorship, on terrorism and bloodshed, on crematoria and fire, on murderous fanaticism.

The world leadership is responsible for the fate of humanity. We ought not to place our hope in mankind's resilience.

Human progress and technology do not ensure the prevention of totalitarianism and may be used by tyranny to achieve its goals. We have seen that thinkers and philosophers, great musicians and composers, scientists and doctors can place themselves at the disposal of despotic rulers and become partners to ruin, destruction and bloodshed. This is what happened in the Shoah.

I wish to honour the exceptional persons, members of the Polish people and other nations, the Righteous Among the Nations, who felt the pain of the persecuted, who provided shelter and thereby risked their lives.

Dear survivors, we commend you for returning to life, for daring again to feel that you belong to the world, for finding the inner strength to again raise families, for again believing in man.

May the memory of the victims be blessed.

Rethinking rejection

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

"I'm not interested." "Leave me alone." "Stop bothering me." I was canvassing for Montreal's FEDERATION CJA, and people were rejecting me! With canvassing comes rejection, and while most people were polite – and some even quite generous – some people treated me with contempt. And I must say, rejection really hurts.

It's human nature to avoid rejection. Instinctively, we try to fit in. We know that any behaviour that courts disapproval from others can make us unpopular and unsupported by our social group. As a result, we fear rejection and train ourselves to avoid anything that invites it.

This fear prevents us from doing things we truly want to do. We avoid asking for raises, asking people out on dates or even asking for directions, because we don't want to be rejected. Indeed, most salespeople must be trained to "turn off" this deeply rooted instinct so they can do their jobs. Sometimes, fear of rejection gets in the way.

But it's not only fear that matters. Our understanding of rejection determines the course of our lives. Rejection is often viewed as the end of a narrative, as in "I applied to Oxford, I was rejected, and therefore I was doomed to a second-tier school." I tried, I was rejected, end of story. Rejection means only one thing: the end of our hopes and dreams.

But this need not be how we perceive rejection. We can see failures as temporary setbacks, or even valuable lessons. As Winston Churchill put it, "Success is the ability to go from one failure to another with no loss of enthusiasm."

No question, it's difficult to recover from large rejections. Firings, divorces, and bankruptcies are crushing defeats. It's hard to pick yourself up and start over, particularly if you've already tasted success. But the only way to stop rejection from being the final chapter is by writing a new one.

Indeed, the most inspiring success stories are the ones in which the protagonist carries on after enduring defeat. Like the inventor who tries thousands of experiments before reaching a major breakthrough. Or the best-selling author who was once a single mother on welfare. Or the failed politician who returns to rally his country to victory in World War II. Or the penniless Holocaust survivor who, years later, leaves behind a legacy of philanthropy. Or the nation that was exiled for nearly 2,000 years until it finally returned home. These are all examples of seeing rejection as a mere obstacle on the road to success.

Rejections are crushing. But their impact depends greatly on your perspective. It's up to us to redefine rejection and struggle to start again. Because failure is only final when we give up hope.

Enchanted by Ella

Gil Troy in Montreal

Do you ever watch the news and wonder if you are watching a farce instead? With so many students relying on Jon Stewart's Daily Show for news, and with CBS actually contemplating working Stewart into its news show, the line between reality and satire often blurs. Unfortunately, while Stewart is a comedian, all too often the farce we see these days is tragic.

In Montreal, after years of not receiving equitable funding for its private schools, the Jewish community gets a break and has a shot at fairness. What happens? A media and political firestorm ensues – bristling with anti-Semitic overtones. The premier caves, and the Jews, having been pummeled up and down the St. Lawrence Seaway, are now blamed for fomenting ethnic tension – and being hypersensitive!

In Toronto, the University of Toronto's Institute for Women's Studies and Gender Studies promotes a campus-wide "Israeli Apartheid Week" on its listserve. Not only are there no sessions dealing with the Palestinians' oppression of women, there are no sessions dealing with women at all. One wonders how this event is related to women's studies or gender – beyond the implicit acknowledgment that Israel-bashing has become such a tenet of the academic left that the connection is obvious to the politically correct crowd.

Meanwhile, across the pond in England, Prince Harry masquerades as a Nazi. In most news outlets worldwide, Jewish spokespeople are the ones condemning his bad taste. When did Hitler become a Jewish issue? Didn't the Luftwaffe bomb Harry's own London? Can't British war veterans teach the prince some history – and sensitivity to their sacrifice?

The news from the Middle East is even wackier. While the world continues to bless newly elected Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as a peacemaker – because he's not Yasser Arafat – bombs continue to burst in Israeli faces and Qassams from Gaza rain down on the innocents of Sderot in the Negev.

In a world obsessed with the travails of Jennifer Aniston and Brad Pitt and a culture that confuses the athletic exploits of pituitary mutants with heroics, there seems to be no room amid the media clutter to learn about real heroes.

Consider the tale of Ella Abukasis. One Shabbat in January, as she and her siblings returned from a Bnei Akiva youth group meeting in Sderot, a Palestinian Qassam rocketed toward her and her 11-year-old brother Tamir. Hearing the warning siren – which gives just precious seconds to respond – Ella dove on top of her brother. As a result, Tamir sustained shrapnel wounds but survived, while Ella absorbed most of the blow and died six days later.

Ella will attend no masquerades, so she will never have to weigh the propriety of one costume or another. She will not make it to universities, so she will never have to consider intellectuals' foolishness and faddishness. A religious Israeli, she probably would not have understood the talmudic distinctions in the patchwork quilt of Quebec schools between privately funded private schools and partially publicly funded private schools. Ella was 17 years old, but she already knew the value of human life, the meaning of sacrifice and the depth of familial love.

The older generation liked to say "Schwer tzu sein a yid" – it's tough to be a Jew. And in a January of broken moral compasses – let alone Manichean university campuses – in Montreal, Toronto, London and Gaza, it's easy to echo that complaint.

But I am so proud to be part of Ella's extended family, as a fellow Jew who shares in her family's sorrow. I am – and we are – ennobled by Ella, enchanted by Ella, and challenged by Ella.

What are we doing to reach out to Ella's family – and the hundreds of other families encased in grief, continuing victims of Arafat's unholy war? And what are we doing to make sure that there will be no more Ellas – on either side of the border – forced to choose between life and death, between her and her brother.

Unlike others, we don't look at Ella and hope for more glorious deaths like hers. We look at Ella and yearn for more beautiful lives like hers. That, too, makes me proud to be a Jew, no matter what my neighbours, colleagues or enemies may say.

Old Israel, new Israel

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

This is the story of a jacket – to be specific, my husband's green winter jacket, which was accidentally left on the shelf of the Egged bus that carried us from Jerusalem to the railway station in north Tel Aviv, our house keys zippered securely in an inner pocket.

On a recent, brief trip to surprise my nephew Yoni as he was sworn in as an officer in the Israeli Navy (as – allow me this aunty pride – chanich mitztayein, first in his class), my husband and I were struck repeatedly by the "new Israel" of technology, toll roads and creature comforts.

We arrived, for example, at the state of the art international air terminal designed by Moshe Safdie. No longer do visitors clamber down several flights of metal stairs to disembark from a jumbo jet, then schlepping their belongings onto a bus after facing the elements. No, we deplaned like menschen, emerging via a jetway directly into the terminal, onto moving sidewalks that whisked us into a glistening, cutting-edge facility. I confess feeling a twinge of nostalgia for the old Israel and that first step onto the tarmac before the formal entry into the country. But the new Israel really works!

Back to the jacket: my husband realized it was missing as soon as we arrived at our hotel, a 10-minute ride from the bus terminal. Not relishing the prospect of returning to a Canadian winter in shirt sleeves, and relishing even less being locked out of our home, we immediately attempted to phone Egged in north Tel Aviv. We thought if we could reach them quickly enough, someone could retrieve the jacket before the bus departed.

For 20 minutes we tried various numbers. Sometimes the phone would ring endlessly. Occasionally, someone would answer and tell us to call a different number (which would also ring endlessly). This was the Israel we remember from way back: nothing works, no one works. As in the Israel before cellphones, we realized that phoning wouldn't work. We had to go back to the bus terminal. By then, of course, our bus was elsewhere.

We located Egged personnel and explained our plight. The supervisor handed us a cardboard carton coated with dust. This was the lost and found, he told us. We were welcome to look through it. None of the contents had been retrieved more recently than six years ago, and nothing was worth more than six shekels. The supervisor was not interested in helping us further. The jacket would certainly show up in a few weeks. When we pressed him – we were departing the following morning – he suggested that we go to the sixth floor of the central bus station in Tel Aviv. They have computers there, he told us.

During the 45-minute bus ride, my husband and I acknowledged the futility of our quest. There wasn't sufficient time for a lost jacket to work its way into the system before our departure. And there we were, wasting our last afternoon in Israel on a fruitless and frustrating search.

The elevator at the central bus station would not stop at the sixth floor. It stopped at 6A – the mezzanine between six and seven – only to dump us into a vestibule that dead-ended at a locked door. Finally, a hidden staircase led us to the sixth floor, where we located a lost and found office, a room-sized version of the cardboard box.

"On a bus today?" the man in charge mused. "No, that wouldn't be here. Not this week." He directed us down a hallway, down an escalator, through a set of glass doors, across a road to a set of blue doors. "They're locked," he warned us. "Security reasons, you understand. Just wait until somebody leaves, and you can get inside. Computers."

Once there, we found ourselves surrounded by Egged drivers on break. Finally we spotted it – three men behind a counter and a computer. The first man stared catatonically at the monitor. The second argued loudly with a co-worker. The third juggled three cellphones, worked the computer and – between calls – listened to our story.

"No," he said, "No jacket reported. Can't help you."

With that, his companion broke off his argument. "A jacket? Green? Is it this one?"

It was.

Yes, the old Israel is alive and well in the new Israel. Nothing works, no one works, and somehow, it all works out.

The Kirshner File

India's Bene Israel descended from shipwrecked Jews

Samson Joseph Isaac Talkar, a member of Mumbai's venerable Bene Israel community, was talking about the long history of his people in India. "We have been here for 2,000 years," said Talkar, a formal and earnest man of 68 who was an assistant police commissioner in Mumbai, India's biggest city, before his retirement in 1995. Talkar, a policeman for 38 years who specialized in homicide, added, "We observed our religion and we did not forget our Shabbat and our Shema. In the course of time, we forgot some of our prayers, but not the essentials of the Judaic faith."

Sheldon Kirshner in Mumbai

Like all Bene Israel, the predominant sub-group of Indian Jewry today, Talkar is familiar with the broad outlines of his people's historical narrative. His forefathers, Jews from ancient Palestine, migrated to India before the destruction of the Second Temple, and have been here ever since. "We're the descendants of seven families," explained Joshua Aaron Shapurkar, a 30something tourist guide who shows foreigners the sharply contrasting sights of his pulsating metropolis.

Leora Ezekiel

The story that Talkar and Shapurkar tell, though shrouded in legend, is identical. Around the second century BCE, a vessel from the Land of Israel was shipwrecked off India's tropical Konkan coast. The survivors, seven men and seven women, swam safely to shore, settled in the village of Navgaon and began working in agriculture, mainly as oil pressers. "We mingled with the locals," said Talkar, whose physical features and speech rhythms are exactly the same as dusky-complexioned Hindus. "There was a change in our colour."

Isolated from mainstream Jewry for centuries, the Bene Israel were gradually assimilated in terms of language, customs and dress. They spoke Marathi as their knowledge of Hebrew faded away. They adopted a local thanksgiving ceremony, Malida, in which men celebrated the harvest by sitting around a table festooned with flowers, spices, fruits and rice. Out of respect to their Hindu neighbours, they cut beef out of their diet. They appropriated surnames that reflected the names of their villages. "You'll notice that almost all Bene Israel names end with 'kar,'" explained Shapurkar. And the clothes they wore, particularly saris, were no different than that of Hindus.

Though culturally Indian, the Bene Israel were, of course, Jewish. Like the Jews of Ethiopia, who similarly lost touch with their fellow Jews abroad, the Bene Israel felt Jewish to their core. "We were observant," said Talkar. "I'm very categorical about that."

And though they were unfamiliar with Jewish texts and had no synagogues for centuries, the Bene Israel retained a whole host of Jewish practices. They circumcised their sons. They held fast to dietary laws. They did not work on the Sabbath.

Beginning in the 18th century, they established contact with the Jews of Cochin, in the southern Indian state of Kerala, and with the Jews of Yemen. Both groups brought the Bene Israel into the mainstream of modern Judaism. In 1796, Samuel Divekar built Shaar Harahamim – the Bene Israel's first synagogue – in the heart of Masjid, a mainly Muslim district in Mumbai famous for its open-air bazaars. A cream-coloured building with three blue Stars of David on its facade, Shaar Harahamim is one of several functioning synagogues in Mumbai.

During the British colonial era – which ended with the advent of India's independence in 1947 – the Bene Israel drifted into Mumbai, known as Bombay until 1996. But even now, upward of 150 Bene Israel can still be found in a cluster of villages along the fabled Konkan coastline, earning their livelihoods as rice and betel nut farmers, and in one case, according to Shapurkar, as oil pressers.

In British India, the Bene Israel were government clerks, soldiers, tradesmen and farmers. Some went into the professions and practised medicine and law. Still others were senior administrators in the state bureaucracy.

Mumbai's Jewish community also included Baghdadi Jews from the Middle East. The Baghdadis – led in the 19th century by David Sassoon, a wealthy merchant from Iraq– closely allied themselves with the British and tended to patronize and snub the Bene Israel.

Thus, until quite recently, there was no love lost between the Baghdadis and the Bene Israel. "My father distinctly remembers when they looked down on us," recalled Benny Isaac, a 62-year-old Bene Israel and the director of ORT (Organization of Rehabilitation and Training) in Mumbai. "We were very Indian in our ways, and the Baghdadis suspected our Jewishness. But let me tell you: DNA studies have shown that the Bene Israel are the children of Aaron and Moses." He chuckled. "My Baghdadi friends find that hard to believe."

Taklar agrees. "These people did not mingle with us. They were aloof from us. They didn't allow our boys to marry their girls. And they never counted us for their minyan. There was bickering between us." And Baghdadis did not allow Bene Israel into their synagogues, Shapurkar claimed.

"But these tensions of old are gone," said Isaac. "Today, they are dependent on us. They can't raise a minyan without us." In Shapurkar's view, these caste-like divisions basically broke down with the virtual departure of the Baghdadis from India after 1947. By all accounts, some 150 Baghdadis continue live in Mumbai, compared to some 4,000 Bene Israel, many of whom reside in Thane, a suburb 40 kilometres northwest of the city.

Strangely enough, the Bene Israel also tolerated a caste system in their community and divided themselves into "gora" (white) and "kala" (black) Jews. The division, which was based on ancestry and skin colour, disappeared decades ago. "It existed in my grandfather's time," said Leora Ezekiel, the 36-year-old director of the Evelyn Peters Jewish Community Centre, the only one of its kind in India. "It doesn't exist anymore."

The Bene Israel are proudly patriotic. "We're totally considered as Indians," said Shapurkar. "We have never felt like outsiders in India," noted Isaac. "Why? It's really very simple. Hinduism is a tolerant religion. It allows people to follow their own path."

Ezekiel elaborated. "We don't have a history of anti-Semitism in India, and our relations with Hindus – and Muslims – are excellent." Ezekiel's assertion is basically true, and a measure of its accuracy is that the so-called "new anti-Semitism," which emerged after 2000, has not reached India.

Yet India's Jewish community, whose population has fallen to 5,000, has been in a state of decline for years. From a high of approximately 30,000 in the 1940s, the community has been sapped by a steady stream of emigration.

"Most youth are leaving," said Sharon Galsupkar, a 28-year-old ORT employee. "There are better prospects outside India." In an average year, 100 or so Jews immigrate to Israel, where the Jewishness of the Bene Israel was doubted by some until the mid-1960s.

Still others have headed to Canada. The children of 71-year-old Abraham Samson – the proprietor of Menora Industries, a toothbrush company, and the president of Magen Hassidim, the largest synagogue in Mumbai – have all left. His son, Gabriel, lives in Toronto, while his three daughters reside in Israel. Yet a number of Jews, like Talkar, whose son and daughter have also left the country, are content to remain in India and insist that Indian Jews have a future.

"The Bible says we all have to go back to the Promised Land. But we are happy here. I don't want to leave." He paused. "We are not an endangered species." Ezekiel made the same point. "We're a vibrant community with lots of weddings and births. There is emigration, true, but there are people who like it here and are staying."

Christian Zionists

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

A year ago, I was asked by B'nai Brith to join Return Ministries, a group of Christian Zionists, on a tour of Israel.

The group believes that predictions of the prophets of Israel concerning the return of the Jewish people to the land is being fulfilled. Since God has returned B'nai Yisrael to Eretz Yisrael, we are living in a pre-messianic era. Even as we pray daily for the messianic era to end war and bloodshed so do our religious Christian friends pray for peace in the world.

I visited Israel many times with family, congregants and special needs groups, as well as with the United Jewish Appeal, Israel Bonds and Rabbinic Mission. I had concerns about the success of this trip. Proof that it was indeed a meaningful one is that we are planning another visit this May, preceded by a trip to Auschwitz and Poland.

The executive director of Return Ministries, Dean Bye, expressed his feelings about our joint experience. He said: "I thank God for the opportunity to be alive in the hour that the people and land of Israel is being restored according to fulfilment of the Word of God. To experience Israel is one wonderful thing... but to experience Israel together [as Christians and Jews] is a blessed gift from God.

"Words could hardly express my gratitude to God, for Rabbi and Mrs. Kelman, for venturing out with a busload of Christians through the land of Israel.

"My life and others was impacted and changed. I believe we all experienced the peace and presence of God in a deeper way. Now there are many more Christians working on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people in Canada."

Annie Elliot, Bye's assistant, said: "The Together for Israel Mission that I was privileged to participate in last May 2004 with Rabbi Kelman and his wife, Sara, provided a unique opportunity for Jews and Christians to walk together in sincere friendship and shared love for the land and the people of Israel. Our hearts were knit together... as we travelled throughout the land with a mutual respect for the differences in our faith. We were encouraged, enriched and blessed to have experienced Israel together."

Travelling with this group was a religious experience for me, too. Each morning on the bus, our Christian Zionists, carrying their own Bibles, read selections to begin each day. We enjoyed their lovely singing of the psalms and sharing soulful prayers fit for every occasion.

They were anxious for new insights, and it was my privilege to add interpretations from the Talmud and the midrash, with which they were not familiar. Their thirst for knowledge was not only for biblical knowledge but also for understanding the customs and traditions of religious groups in Israel.

The group was considerate, addressing prayers to the Lord of the Universe and to the God of the children of Israel. They deny having an agenda to convert Jews to Christianity and express penitence and sorrow for Jewish suffering.

They arrived with suitcases filled with gifts for hospitalized children and for new immigrants. They gave blood at Magen David Adom. Through support of Israel's economy and helping aliyah, the group hopes to actualize the messianic promise.

On their return to Canada, they determined to share a true picture of Israel's accomplishments and to negate the hostile and negative view of Israel expressed in the newspapers and on television.

We found the Return Ministries to be both generous and true friends of Israel.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman is rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda.

From Iraq to Israel

Guest Voice

By GLADYS PERESS MOOALLEM

The year was 1951. We were living in Baghdad. I had just finished my high school matriculation exams. But the dreams I had and those of my family were shattered by a new political climate.

The Iraqi government was accusing Jews, at random, of being either Zionists or communists, imprisoning them, torturing some, and hanging them in public. It was done in front of their families and used to spread fear and terror throughout the Jewish community.

The Baghdad Jewish community was an old one. While most Jewish communities in Europe and much of the Arab world suffered at the hands of the majority, Jews in Baghdad were generally comfortable. For centuries, we were left alone and had our schools and neighbourhoods. We ran our own businesses and the Arab Iraqis tolerated us. Most of us were well off and our children were well-educated and cultured.

But with the new political climate, life was not normal any more. We were scared, worried and confused. Prominent Jews were disappearing, No one knew where to turn and nobody felt safe.

It seemed unthinkable, but we felt we had to leave. Some people tried to escape illegally. Where to go and how? Few Jews were allowed to obtain passports, and even if they had them, other countries did not accept many of us.

The Iraqi government, under international pressure, decided to let us go to Israel. My family and I were among the many Jews who were stripped of our nationality because we wanted out.

Unfortunately, that was unexpectedly followed by the Iraqi government also stripping us of our property and allowing us to leave with only one suitcase and 50 pounds. We were considered traitors and would never be allowed to return.

Israel was very poor then. A family of seven, we lived in a tent near Petah Tikva for six months, without electricity or running water. Then, we were moved to a one-room wooden shack, also without electricity or running water. We never imagined our lives would come to that. We lived in those primitive conditions for seven long years, until we got our own shikun, a small apartment.

Work was scarce, and we had to take anything available in order to survive. My mother got sick; my father was totally frustrated and furious all the time. He had been the successful, proud head of the family in Iraq, and he could not provide for his family in Israel.

I spent long days in Tel Aviv, working by day and continuing my studies at night. I remember having to walk through dark alleyways to get home. I sometimes had tears in my eyes. I had mixed feelings about my new home. It was all so hard. Yet in Israel I was not afraid to walk alone, in the dark, without worrying that someone would follow me. I could not have done that in Baghdad.

We lost our money, our houses and our positions when we left Iraq, but we lost our dignity only temporarily. Despite all the hardships, nobody remained a refugee for long.

My four younger sisters finished high school, which was costly. They studied with the help of a kerosene lamp at night and worked part of the day.

Eventually, we all got good educations and respectable positions, and married and had children.

We always remembered what we had given up by leaving Iraq. In a way, it all felt bittersweet. Not long ago, as we were emptying a chest of drawers belonging to my dear late father and late mother, we found the documents of ownership from our two houses in Baghdad. My parents had kept them in the hope that her descendants would get some compensation.

Although we gave up a lot when we left Iraq, we gained personal security, personal rights, and great opportunities for ourselves. We became part of a Jewish country.

Some of our people are now government ministers and others are professionals. We are proud of our community and of Israel for helping us to become an important part of the flourishing country. We look forward to a continuing strong Israel, with our heart within and God overhead.

Jewish Life

The Jewish artist Bezalel

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

For the next few weeks, the Torah readings will describe the instructions for the building of the Tabernacle and ritual objects.

There is tremendous detail in these descriptions and there is an enormous amount of accumulated commentary on the significance of all of the details. The measurements, the materials used and the intricate details – all are painstakingly outlined. And then God identifies a man named Bezalel Ben-Uri Ben-Hur of the tribe of Judah. Bezalel is identified by God as the artist with Divine inspiration in his heart.

The question of Judaism and artistic expression begins with the beginnings of Jewish law: the revelation at Sinai. The 10 commandments raise the question of creating images of God, images of creation, and imitations of the original that can mislead in their flat representations of Divine creations. And suddenly God speaks of a man who has been divinely commissioned to create Jewish art: Bezalel Ben-Uri Ben-Hur.

Jewish artistic expressions have always centred on narrative, song, dance or any other medium that did not focus on visual arts. We have always been careful about painting or sculpting anything but abstract art. And yet with all of our hesitation, how have we ignored Bezalel? How can he teach us to be a Jewish artist?

When God describes Bezalel, God identifies him by name and then states that God has filled him with a Divine Spirit and various forms of wisdom and visions. The artist becomes the tool and the message, and the art is much greater than the artist. What is to be experienced is the greater abstraction that stands beyond the artist. Bezalel facilitates a connection back to God who inspired him. The artist is almost the prophet.

Interestingly, shortly after meeting Bezalel, God tells Moses to return to the people and we are saddened to read of the outrage of the Golden Calf – another art form.

Clearly the differences are stark. Where Bezalel's work connected Israel to God through art, the uninspired work, the Golden Calf, represents the rift. The Israelites worshipped the Golden Calf, they worshipped the art for its own sake. It connected them nowhere, and spoke of no greater abstraction, no deeper spirituality. It spoke only of the product of a human hand and could not move its observer anywhere beyond since it did not originate from the soul.

Recognizing beauty in the world, recognizing artistry within creation is elevating ourselves spiritually to recognizing God as Divine Artist and we have been granted permission to live amidst the art. The Tosefta states: if a person says no more than "how beautiful is this bread! Blessed be He who is everywhere for having created it," that is sufficient blessing over the bread.

Bezalel, the Jewish artist, teaches us that to truly recognize beauty in the world around us is to recognize the Hand of God that created and inspires the heart of the artist.

Cholent on the web, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Although cholent may not seem to be exotic fare, there are countless varieties and many closely held recipes.

The bubbie of all cholent lists can be found at the Jewish-Food Cholent Archives. At last count, there were almost 50 cholent recipes. But if you are really daring, why not try out the Chocolate Cholent or the Yogurt Curry Cholent. [www.jewish-food.org/recipes/choindex.htm] Add to that the offerings from the RFCJ Archives (tofu and shiitake mushroom, rib-sticking and vegetarian "local") and you can prepare a different recipe every Shabbat for a year. [http://tinyurl.com/6u55g]

Or you may want to try yaptzok, a Polish potato cholent in which nary is a bean is found. (I grew up on yaptzok, so I don't even want to get into the controversy over whether it is a genuine cholent or a variation of a potato kugel!) [http:// tinyurl.com/6g89n] For more variations, take a look at Oded Schwartz's Cholent – The Ultimate Shabbat Food. [www.gemsinisrael.com/shabbat.html] And if you're game for something a bit different, try bison cholent. [http://tinyurl.com/4k9ja]

It's not uncommon to enjoy cholent while downing an alcoholic beverage. But instead of washing down your cholent with a drink, why not pour it into your cholent? Cantor Joel Kessler of Adas Kodesch Shel Emeth of Wilmington, Delaware, has graciously supplied his recipe for Beer Cholent. [www.kashrut.com/recipes/beer_cholent/]

Rabbi J. Hershy Worch, a Lubavitch rabbi living in Australia, paid a visit to the Jews of Uganda and prepared for them something they had never had – cholent. The Abayudaya Jews always knew that cooking is forbidden on Saturday, but they weren't aware that Jewish law does allow food to be precooked and kept warm on Shabbat. Rabbi Worch explains how he built an oven into the packed earth floor of his bedroom, filled it with kidney beans, onions, garlic, salt, pepper, cloves and cumin, and served the Jews of Uganda their first hot Shabbat afternoon meal. [http://tinyurl. com/7y8zs]

George Erdosh enjoyed his family's cholent in Hungary before the war. He has tips about the ingredients and flavouring, along with practical cholent advice I hadn't seen on other sites. Check out Indigestion on Shabbat at JewishMag.com. [www.jewishmag.com/43mag/cholent/cholent.htm]

"Kayla Kuchleffel's" CHA-CHA-CHA CHOLENT doesn't offer any recipes. Rather, she examines cholent as a social phenomenon. "It is a known fact that in shuls where the rebbetzin serves cholent every week, there is 100 per cent attendance by men, women and children. Cholent is the glue (or should I say cement) that holds the congregants to their shul." [www.countryyossi.com/jan00/humor.htm]

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron's Congregation discloses the recipe for his "famous" cholent. Don't miss the minuscule note at the bottom of the page: "DISCLAIMER: Making cholent is an art, not a science." [www.shul.org/cholent.html]

All those recipes; all those recommendations. Sounds a bit daunting, doesn't it? That's how a couple of self-described "cholent virgins" felt when they embarked on preparing a Shabbat meal. So they turned to the Chowhound's kosher community message board for cholent help. [http://tinyurl.com/4tr3v]

And if you want to find a community that is devoted to the Sabbath stew, you need not go further than the Cholent Mix blog. "There are four necessary ingredients in my cholent," Velvel writes in the blog. "If any of these are missing, it's not cholent: meat, beans, barley, potatoes. I prefer the addition of the following ingredients, but Weight Watchers dietary restrictions, spicy-heat tolerance and the common sense of my wife may limit these: kishke, bourbon/beer, hot peppers, liquid smoke and maple syrup or honey." [http://cholentmix.blogspot.com/]

Perhaps delighting in a good cholent pays spiritual dividends. The Ohr Somayach site adds that the Jewish commentator, the Be'al HaMeor, composed the following poem in praise of those who eat hot food on Shabbat: [http://ohr.edu/ask_db/ask_main.php/70/Q2/]

"Who prepares cooked foods/ And wraps them 'round/ Delights in Shabbat… / Gains a pound… / He's the one whose faith is sound;/ When Mashiach comes/ He'll be around."

Auschwitz 'anniversary gift' proposed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Canada is being urged to take a leadership role at the United Nations to push for a resolution declaring suicide bombing a crime against humanity.

"That would be the best anniversary gift the world could receive on the 60th anniversary of [the liberation of] Auschwitz," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

Rabbi Marvin Hier

The centre has raised the issue with the Pope, European leaders and Canadian government officials. "We say there is a role for Canada, that Canada has a distinguished record on human rights," Rabbi Hier said.

Canada could help pass a resolution that would make suicide bombing, whether directed at Jews, Christians or Muslims, an international crime.

Rabbi Hier said no country has taken up the centre's challenge to introduce the resolution, but noted that "resolutions against Israel can be passed in hours."

Speaking over lunch during a short visit to Toronto, Rabbi Hier suggested the current level of international anti-Semitism is a shocking development, particularly as it comes 60 years after the defeat of Nazi Germany.

European Jews today have become virtual "Marranos," he said, a reference to Spanish Jews who were forced to convert and practise Christianity, but continued to practise Jewish rituals behind closed doors during the Spanish Inquisition.

Chief rabbis in Europe have asked their parishioners not to wear public displays of Judaism, such as yarmulkes, Stars of David or distinctive clothing. Rabbi Hier said French Jews are being intimidated by fundamentalist Muslims more than by neo-Nazis.

"Without the Islamic influence, there would still be anti-Semitism, but not manifested to this extent," he said.

Rabbi Hier noted that educators in Belgium and Holland are afraid to teach about the Holocaust with Muslim students in their classes. "They object to it and violence can break out," he said.

Radical Islam is growing in Europe, and mainstream Muslims are either ambivalent about it or are afraid to oppose it, he said.

He added that European political leaders must react to the growing anti-Semitism, take charge of the schools and create a climate in which Jews feel comfortable. "Long-term Jews may have to re-think if Europe is viable for them," he said, noting that many French Jews in particular are "bolting" for Israel.

"Sixty years ago, no one would have dreamed this. If you said this would happen, you'd be called crazy," he added.

Fromm tries to keep teaching licence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Former school teacher Paul Fromm is contesting an effort by the Ontario College of Teachers (OCT) to strip him of his teaching licence for his associations with white supremacist and neo-Nazi organizations.

Facing an OCT disciplinary hearing last week, Fromm argued he was being "censored" for political activities in his private life which did not intrude into the classroom.

"You will have to make a decision about teachers and their outside political activity and if it should be censored," the Toronto Star quotes him saying.

Fromm is facing a number of allegations of professional misconduct, including failure to maintain the standards of the profession, conduct unbecoming a teacher and failing to comply with the Education Act and its regulations.

He lost his job as a teacher with the Peel Region Board of Education in 1997 after the board's trustees found he disregarded a 1993 warning against participating in programs organized by white supremacists.

"As a teacher, Fromm's conduct must be perceived to uphold the values and beliefs which are fundamental to the education system and the Peel Board of Education — including multiculturalism and ethnocultural equity. Fromm's remarks and activities have demonstrated a profound disrespect for these principles," Janet McDougald, the board's vice-chair, stated at the time.

The labour tribunal ruled 2-1 that restrictions on Fromm's Charter rights to free speech and free association were justifiable given his position as a role model and mentor in the education system.

Fromm "conducted himself in a manner that had as a reasonable and probable consequence the undermining of public confidence in the ability of the Peel Board to provide all of its students a school system free from bias, prejudice and intolerance," the majority ruled.

The Star reported the tribunal turned down Fromm's request for a one-month adjournment so he could perform background checks on the panel members to determine if they were biased against him. Fromm is quoted as saying he wanted to hold onto his teaching licence as "a matter of principle and honour."

Tu b'Shvat seder promotes environmentalism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Nature Centre of Canada, Torat HaTeva, is intent on re-connecting Jews to the environment.

The organization, whose mission is to promote ecological awareness and provide models for spiritually and ecologically sustainable Jewish living, held the fifth annual Tu b'Shvat seder at Earl Bales Park Community Centre.

The fifth annual Tu b'Shvat seder sponsored by The Jewish Nature Centre of Canada, Torat HaTeva, was organized by, from right, Shai Spetgang, Matthew Steinberg, Lisa Steinberg, Tally Wolf and Chaya Leah Purwitsky. Missing is Matthew Somers. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

Tally Wolf, educational director of Torat HaTeva, said the concept for the seder, in honour of the Jewish new year of the trees, goes back to the 15th century, but in recent years "there has been new life breathed into it."

Environmentalism is an inherent part of Jewish life, said Shai Spetgang, chair of the board of directors of Torat HaTeva. "One of our foremost mitzvot is, prevent waste – do not destroy things for no reason."

The group's commitment to help the environment, he said, "is our commitment to Judaism. In addition to our personal and national identities, we all exist as part of humanity and all of creation."

Each morning and evening before reciting the Shema, "there are two blessings that introduce the declaration of the oneness: one for nature and one for Torah," he said.

At the seder, participants were reminded of how "wasteful we can be. Our obsession with overpackaging haunts us and mocks us in the form of landfills and litter.

"Pollutants from its production fill our air and intercede with our sun's light, turning it against us," Spetgang said. "The mitzvah of guarding the body originates as a caution to care for one's soul. The body is the soul's encasement, its means of nourishment and sustenance. How beautiful it is then, that keeping one's body fed organically, wholesomely and without toxicity is at once healthy for the soul and the earth."

Participants were told to use the date palm, one of the seven species of Israel, as an example of how to conduct their lives.

"Dates can be used for food or medicinal purposes. Husks are used for camel fodder, fibres for weaving of baskets and rope. Its presence signifies the location of an oasis, and its fronds are used for shelter.

"Best of all, it is biodegradable and renewable… let us become more conscious of how the packaging we choose affects both our physical and spiritual lives."

Torat HaTeva offers, among other programs, seminars for students of all ages, a wilderness adventure for grades 7 and 8 students, programs for synagogues and community centres; training for camp staff, naturalists and Jewish educators; and a small community outreach program.

Gold lambastes UN for treating Israel unfairly

World body described as 'a broken moral compass'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations has compared that world body to "a broken moral compass."

Dore Gold, Israel's representative at the UN from 1997 to 1999, delivered his scathing critique at the University of Toronto last week.

His appearance was sponsored by Hasbara Fellowships, Aish Hatorah, Betar-Tagar, HonestReporting Canada and Birthright Israel.

Through a succession of resolutions critical of its policies on the Palestinians, the UN has treated Israel unfairly and with a lack of fundamental justice, said Gold, currently director of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

Gold – who was Benjamin Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser before and after he was elected prime minister in 1996 – said the UN was born in a moment of "extraordinary moral clarity" after World War II, but has since squandered its capital.

Claiming it has betrayed its mission, Gold, who has written a new book on the topic, Tower of Babble, accused the UN of a failure to distinguish between legitimate self-defense and terrorism.

Citing an example, he spoke of the UN's decision to ask the International Court of Justice in The Hague for a ruling on the legality of the security fence Israel is building through and along the West Bank.

Last summer, the court condemned the fence as illegal, basing its verdict on the fact that it intrudes into the West Bank, and called for its dismantlement. In a widely supported resolution, the UN General Assembly subsequently urged Israel to take down the fence.

Gold said Israel has a right under UN article 51 to build the barrier as a defensive measure to combat terrorism. He did not speak to the issue that the fence juts into the West Bank and separates Palestinians from their homes, farms and institutions.

He described the passage of a 1997 UN resolution deploring Israel's construction of an apartment complex in eastern Jerusalem's Har Homa district as yet another instance of UN unfairness toward Israel.

Gold said Israel was merely building condos on Jewish-owned land. Palestinian leaders characterized the Har Homa project as a unilateral attempt by Israel to pre-determine the outcome of negotiations with the Palestinians.

Gold, who served as ambassador when Har Homa was the subject of passionate debate, said the UN's attitude toward that issue convinced him that something was terribly amiss at the UN.

He asked why, on the other hand, the UN did not condemn the Palestinians for not living up to their obligations under the Oslo peace accords to deal effectively with terrorism as perpetrated by such groups as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

According to Gold, the UN displayed "moral laxity" in three additional events: the election of Syria – a sponsor of terrorism – as a non-permanent member of the Security Council; the UN's disregard of warnings of an impending massacre in Rwanda, and the UN's implicit support of Serbian aggression in the Balkans against Bosnian Muslims.

The UN should not be disbanded, but should be reformed over time, he noted. And Canada ought to take the lead in cleaning it up.

If necessary, Gold went on to say, democratic nations should bypass the UN and work together as allies to combat terrorism.

During a question and answer session, a Palestinian student claimed Israel had not complied with accepted moral standards when it expelled his grandmother from her home in Jaffa during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Though he did not directly address the student's question, Gold said Israel respects the rights of its Arab citizens and the religious rights of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

By contrast, he pointed out, Arab armies destroyed many yeshivot and synagogues in Jerusalem's old Jewish quarter during the 1948 conflict.

In response to further questions, Gold argued that the advent of real democracy in the Arab world may bring peace to the region, and disputed the notion that the Arab-Israeli dispute is at the root of instability in the Mideast.

He also criticized Arab states for boycotting a recent UN session commemorating the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp, and described Iran's long-range missile and nuclear programs as a threat not only to Israel but the world. "It's something we have to watch."

CCRJ head to reach out to smaller communities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As a former Haligonian, the new president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism is very much aware that the Reform movement in Canada is "southern Ontario-centric."

Elliott Jacobson, 59, an accountant who moved to Toronto in 1978, counts off the CCRJ's 26 congregations by location. Nineteen are in Ontario, and the greater Toronto area is the only place that has more than one congregation. There are also Reform congregations in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec. "Well over half the congregations, and much more than half the [Reform] population is in a relatively close area," he said.

"Not being a [native] Torontonian, I hope I'm sensitive to the fact that while the centre is important, the centre's only strong when the rest of the country's connected to it," he said in an interview at the accounting firm of Mintz & Partners, where he is a partner in public practice.

One of his priorities since he succeeded Gavin Herman as CCRJ president at the organization's biennial convention in November, is to work on "connectivity. It's important that the congregations in smaller centres don't feel isolated." Although he doesn't plan "a grand tour," Jacobson does intend to "earn or burn airline points" and is encouraging his vice-presidents to combine CCRJ business with their own travel plans, contacting and visiting member congregations whenever possible.

He is also encouraging larger congregations to provide resources to their smaller counterparts, and lay people to help other lay people.

The CCRJ office, headed by executive director Rabbi Sharon Sobel, is the agent for delivery of services provided to Reform congregations by the New York-based Union for Reform Judaism, Jacobson explained.

Elliott Jacobson

In the United States, Reform is the largest of the Jewish denominations, but Jacobson does not believe that is the case in Canada. In Toronto, he noted, there are more Conservative congregations than Reform. Also, he added, in a lot of smaller cities, if there is only one synagogue, it's more likely to be Conservative or Orthodox than Reform.

Helping congregations to become stronger and more vibrant "will make the Jewish people stronger and will help make Reform stronger within the Jewish people," he said.

He would like more people to know about the good works done within the Reform movement. His own congregation, Holy Blossom Temple, for example, was one of the first Jewish organizations to have an outreach program to the HIV community and was the first synagogue in Toronto to have an Out of the Cold program. "I don't know if those kind of groundbreaking programs are recognized."

More recently, over $50,000 was raised in a few weeks for tsunami relief through the CCRJ, just by asking member congregations to put notices in the pew cards, he said. "Reform tends to be very socially conscious, socially active and financially active."

CCRJ does not usually get involved in religious issues like same-sex marriage and the question of whether rabbis should officiate at marriages between Jews and non-Jews (Reform rabbis in the Toronto area do not officiate at interfaith marriages, however they may choose to officiate at same-sex ceremonies). However, the issue of same-sex marriage was discussed last year at the CCRJ.

"We did believe there was an element of human rights that would indicate – notwithstanding rabbinic decision – we didn't think Reform Jews should object. We wanted to inform lay people and reaffirm that [whether to officiate at same-sex marriages] was a rabbinic decision."

Jacobson's involvement with the Reform movement goes back to his days as a new member at Holy Blossom in 1982.

Although he grew up in a Conservative synagogue in Halifax, he and his wife, Judy Malkin, were drawn to the Reform approach to social action and egalitarianism, and its balance between tradition and modernity.

Contrary to what they had heard about the venerable synagogue – the largest Reform congregation in Canada and among the 10 largest in North America – they found Holy Blossom "open and welcoming," and began learning more about Reform Judaism when they joined a young leadership group.

"My view, from my parents, was that when you belong to an organization, you have an obligation to be involved positively – or to keep your mouth shut," said Jacobson, who grew up in Dartmouth, across the harbour from Halifax.

Starting as a member of the budget and finance committee, he served a two-year term as president of the congregation in the mid-1990s.

He is also active in the Canadian Liver Foundation and the United Way of Metropolitan Toronto.

Anshei Minsk celebrating its 75th anniversary

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The Anshei Minsk synagogue on St. Andrew Street celebrates the 75th anniversary of its building's completion this year.

The shul is located in Kensington Market, surrounded by fruit-and-vegetable markets, cafés and vintage-clothing stores.

Affectionately known as the "The Minsk," it is one of Toronto's oldest synagogues and an important spiritual and social centre for the downtown Jewish community.

When the Jewish community peaked downtown in the 1950s, 30 shuls, from modest storefronts to architectural gems such as the Anshei Minsk, thrived there. With the community's move northward, which began in the late 1950s, most of the synagogues disappeared, transformed into community centres or churches, or demolished.

The Minsk has survived the changing Jewish demographics of downtown Toronto and a fire that nearly destroyed the building.

On March 11, 2002, an arsonist set fire to the shul's upper balcony and set ablaze thousands of books. Damage was estimated at $200,000. Luckily, none of the Torahs were destroyed.

Today, the downtown Jewish community is going through somewhat of a revival. About 20,000 Jews live in downtown Toronto, according to Statistics Canada's 2001 census data. The Anshei Minsk serves those Jews who live and work downtown, as well as those in the area visiting the sick in hospitals, tourists and business travellers, and hundreds who come to enjoy its famous holiday parties.

Popular events at The Minsk include its Purim and Chanukah parties, regular guest lecturers, quarterly Shabbatons, poetry readings, "café nights" and Pesach seders.

Typical of its popular shindigs, the shul's annual Chanukah party last December drew about 200 people, who were packed into the dining hall on a Saturday night.

"Sounds of live music, sizzling latkes, and schmoozing filled the air," says Rabbi Shmuel Spero, spiritual leader of the Anshei Minsk. He adds that although the events aren't touted as singles events, four marriages have resulted in recent years from those gatherings.

"People come and grow in their Yiddishkeit. Relationships are created from this, with God, and other people," says Rabbi Spero.

"Through the years, the events have attracted a certain following. Quite often people feel touched by the shul and what it does for them."

One regular shul-goer, the downtown-based folk singer Noah Zacharin, has led many Shabbat services at Anshei Minsk. A member since 1991, he has performed at the shul's parties and events.

Zacharin says the shul has affected him in many ways, citing the "camaraderie, the rabbi's words of Torah, the cabbage soup, the davening, meeting new travelling Jews, and new downtown Jews."

While The Minsk is Orthodox, Rabbi Spero says that it welcomes all Jews. "I'm happy when the shul can pull together all sorts of people from all kinds of backgrounds. There's never any strings attached," he says.

Rabbi Spero took the helm of The Minsk after arriving from Cleveland, Ohio, in 1988. Since then, the synagogue has become downtown Toronto's only congregation with daily prayer services and regular classes. The shul has also taken on the task of reaching out to Jews who are hungry and homeless.

"We help a lot of people in difficult situations, families especially. They know they can come for support. As a result, the shul does need help from the community more," says Rabbi Spero.

It's not just the locals who come to Anshei Minsk for the many things it has to offer. Tourists come to visit the shul as well.

"There's not a day in the summer that we don't have someone just come by. We're even in the Fodor's travel guide," says Rabbi Spero, noting the shul is regularly featured on tours of Jewish Toronto.

Special "drop by" guests to the shul have included Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, Hollywood actor Adam Sandler and television broadcaster Maury Povich.

Rabbi Spero isn't surprised in the least. "It's part of Toronto's history – it's not just a synagogue," he says.

School's culture club triples in size

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Thanks to the efforts of four Thornhill Secondary School students, the school's Jewish culture club has more than tripled in size since last year.

Since being taken over by co-presidents Sammy Katz and Ashley Amar, and co-vice-presidents Amy Leifer and Brandon Crandall, the club has grown from 14 members in the past few years, to more than 60 members.

"There's no secret to how we did it; we just started advertising like crazy. We printed flyers, and we set up a booth at a spirit assembly and yelled at people through a megaphone to join," says Katz.

The weekly club, sponsored by National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), has been such a hit – it is one of the biggest school culture clubs in Canada – organizers had to get school permission to stay later, says Katz.

They've had speakers such as a Holocaust survivor, and they discuss subjects like anti-Semitism, Israel and Jewish holidays. Last Chanukah, they sold more than 80 tickets to a party held at the school.

There has been a problem with anti-Semitism at the school, says Crandall. "Someone drew graffiti in the washroom that had a heart with Hitler written in the middle. Our mouths dropped when we saw it.

"We wanted to take a picture of it, but it was cleaned up before we had a chance," he says.

They bring up such issues at the club, says Amar, because many students know nothing about the Holocaust. "We've even had some non-Jews come, and it's important for them to know about such things as well.

"We want to teach kids to stand up for Judaism and Israel, and for what they believe in," she says.

Leifer says that the club has changed their school week for the better. "We look forward to socializing and to discussing important issues. We never lack something to talk about."

Their plans include a Purim party, and they would like to take part in any upcoming culture festivals. "We're open to ideas. We want kids to come out and tell us what they'd like. It's everyone's club."

NCSY Rabbi Binyamin Pinkus, who attends the meetings, says he is "blown away by how much the kids have accomplished. [Our organization] sponsors the club, but the energy and momentum comes from them.

"It's a privilege to work with these students. I expect big things from all of them."

Israeli man charged in child porn case

CJN Staff

An Israeli citizen of Ukrainian descent living in North York appeared in court via video link last Thursday on charges of sexual assault and sexual interference involving a 10-year-old Toronto boy.

Vitaly Levshin, 46, received landed immigrant status in 2000 and has been living in Canada ever since.

Last October, Toronto Police were notified by Interpol in Jerusalem that the accused was wanted by Israeli police for allegedly raping a nine-year-old boy, as well as for producing and distributing child pornography and sexually abusing minors.

Israeli authorities notified Toronto Police last year after they charged another Israeli – who they believe is linked to the accused in Toronto – with child pornography offences and commiting sexual assaults on children in Israel.

Police said that after obtaining an immigration arrest warrant in November, they raided an apartment on Antibes Drive in the Bathurst Street-Steeles Avenue area and found about 3,000 photos, as well as videos and films, of boys involved in sex acts with other men or boys, or in various stages of undress.

Toronto Police also believe the accused is part of a pipeline that brings Eastern European children to Canada to act as sex toys, the Toronto Sun reported.

One of 25 alleged victims in the photos seized by police is a Russian boy known as Pasha.

Det.-Sgt. Paul Gillespie told reporters last week that they "show the child being abused when he was approximately seven years old, right through until he's about 16 years old. We watched this boy grow up."

Some of the pictures were taken in Toronto in the summers of 2001 and 2002, and photos of other unidentified boys appear against the backdrop of Toronto landmarks, police said.

Police are hoping to find other victims they know about, as well as others who may not want to come forward.

The accused made his living giving music lessons and playing piano in bars, and he had placed ads in newspapers seeking boys to be his assistants during performances, police said.

He has also lived in and visited Israel, Russia, Moldova and the United States, police said, adding that there may be other victims living in those countries.

CanWest, Israeli firm spar over Post deal

JERUSALEM — Two months after the Jerusalem Post was sold to Winnipeg-based CanWest Global Communications and the Israeli firm Mirkaei Tikshoret (MT), the two new owners have fallen out, and control of the paper is now in the hands of Eli Azur, MT's president and CEO.

Last week, CanWest said MT had breached a joint 50-50 purchase agreement, and that after buying the paper on behalf of the two firms, MT refused to transfer the Post's assets, including real estate in Jerusalem and its presses, to the new joint company set up to manage the paper for the two buyers.

The firms agreed to buy the Post in November from Hollinger International for $13.2 million (US), but since then they have failed to agree on policy and other issues. Sources close to the dispute told Ha'aretz that Azur opposes moving the paper more rightward, something CanWest president and CEO Leonard Asper reportedly wants. Azur, the sources said, feels the move would be a financial and editorial mistake.

The Globe and Mail reported that MT told CanWest executives it now wants 51 to 75 per cent control of the new holding company and refuses to cede editorial control to CanWest, as agreed to in the purchase arrangement.

Sources close to the deal told the Israeli business paper Globes that Azur may want to back out of the deal after learning the land owned by the Jerusalem Post Group is worth $7 million (US), making it possible for him to do without CanWest's $6.6 million share of the purchase price.

Photographer captured airlift of Ethiopian Jews

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The true story of Israel's rescue and absorption of Ethiopia's Jews is more exciting, and perhaps harder to believe, than any Hollywood movie.

How they have fared and where they are now is the subject of a photographic exhibit by American-Israeli photojournalist Ricki Rosen, who documented one of the famous airlifts from the east African country.

Only Canadian stop on North American tour

Rosen displayed some of the photographs from her exhibit and spoke at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre about her experiences and those of her subjects. Her Jan. 23 appearance was her only Canadian stop on a North American tour.

Rosen, who lives in Israel with her husband and children, was working for Time magazine in 1990 when she received a phone call from a journalist friend that influenced her life and work from that day on.

The friend reported that "there was a rumour that there were 100,000 Ethiopian Jews camped out in Addis Ababa waiting for an airlift... I called my editor who said to go ahead. There weren't 100,000 people, but there were thousands."

Rosen was struck by the long lines of people in white robes – white being the colour Ethiopians wear on special occasions – who were waiting to approach the Israeli Embassy in the hope of emigrating.

"They were wearing white because they were close to Zion as they approached the Israeli embassy," she said. "Their longing to come to Israel was just incredibly inspiring."

In 1991, Rosen returned to Ethiopia to document Operation Solomon, the lightning-swift evacuation of more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews in only 33 hours.

"Witnessing Operation Solomon was the highlight of my life," she said.

Rosen has kept in touch with many of the people she photographed before, during and immediately following the airlift, and has put together a photographic exhibit showing them "then and now."

Together with the journalist friend who went with her to Ethiopia in 1990, she has also put her work into a soon-to-be published book called Transformations.

The striking images of Ethiopians then and now reflect the transformation of a people from poor and hungry, rural and largely illiterate to well-nourished, urban members of a modern, democratic society.

To highlight how quickly such a dramatic absorption occurred, Rosen juxtaposed a photo of a mother with the infant she bore just hours after arriving in Israel with a picture of the family at the boy's recent bar mitzvah.

Not all is rosy, however: Rosen noted that the family was unable to afford a celebratory party to mark the occasion.

Although many Ethiopians work at menial, low-paying jobs, their problems are economic rather than a result of racism, Rosen said.

Like immigrants everywhere, they are starting at the bottom, but they are making inroads. The young people are better educated, serve in the army, and are becoming completely integrated into Israeli society, as the photographs clearly show, she said.

Ottawa Jews raise thousands for tsunami relief

By BARRY FISHMAN
Ottawa Jewish Bulletin

The student council and Grade 4 students at Ottawa's Hillel Academy organized a tsunami relief raffle that raised more than $2,300.

OTTAWA — Shortly after the tsunami swept across the Indian Ocean from Thailand to Somalia, killing some 300,000 people and leaving thousands homeless, United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa responded by setting up a fund for the tsunami victims and publicizing it through a mass e-mail campaign.

Jack Silverstein, director of United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa, said the response has been phenomenal.

"The Jewish community of Ottawa is once again rising to the challenge," Silverstein said. "Our phones have been ringing non-stop. In fact, even many of our 'snowbirds' are calling in with their donations to the relief fund."

UJA staff person Jean Myers, who has been taking phone calls, said that "people are very touched by what is going on and want to do all they can to help. It is especially gratifying to see such a very broad range of people giving."

All money raised will be forwarded to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) and associated disaster relief organizations. As of Jan. 17, Ottawa UJA had received $70,000.

Last week, the JDC reported that it had raised more than $12 million (US) in contributions from more than 30,000 individual donors and local Jewish federations across North America, including Calgary, where the Jewish community has raised some $15,000 for tsunami relief.

Many Ottawa Jews have also donated to numerous non-sectarian relief organizations, including the Canadian Red Cross, Doctors Without Borders and CARE Canada.

Young Jews are also helping out.

The student council and Grade 4 students at Hillel Academy organized a tsunami relief raffle. Using their Chanukah gelt and money they had been saving, the kids – and their parents – bought tickets and raised more than $2,300 for the Red Cross.

Sara Breiner, the school's vice-principal of Jewish studies, said she is "proud of everyone who participated," adding that Hillel students learn the importance of tikkun olam – making the world a better place.

"The children are taught that they are not alone. They are part of the world and must do their part in helping people in need."

Rafi Brass, Ottawa student leader with the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), decided that local youth groups should get involved. With the help of Bram Bregman, NCSY Ottawa director, and his fellow NCSY members, Brass organized a tooney drive among teens at Yitzhak Rabin High School, the Ottawa Torah Institute, Machon Sarah High School, Glebe Collegiate, Canterbury High School and Sir Robert Borden High School.

"All the NCSY members thought it was a great idea and everyone wanted to help," Brass said.

In just one week, the students raised more than $1,200 and donated it to the Canadian Red Cross and Chabad of Thailand. Chabad has set up three emergency shelters that distribute aid and medical care to Jews and non-Jews alike.

"I am really impressed with how well these teens did," Bregman said.

The staff at the Early Beginnings Multicultural Child Development Centre, the daycare centre next to the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, also helped out.

"The staff came up with the idea of baking cookies on their lunch hour. When parents came to pick up their children, they were offered a cookie and asked for a donation for tsunami relief," said Marie Stovicek, the centre's director.

The staff collected $510 and donated the money to the Canadian Red Cross.

Elsewhere, at a special bingo event, the seniors at Hillel Lodge donated their winnings to the Red Cross.

Long time volunteer named CEO of Jewish Foundation of Manitoba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba has chosen an insider to fill the void left by the retirement of longtime CEO David Cohen.

Marsha Cowan, who assumes the position on March 1, is a past president of the foundation with a lengthy record of community involvement.

"This was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," Cowan said. "I know the community well. I have a particular interest in the foundation and endowments, so I decided to put my name forward.

"It's exciting to be chosen as David's successor. He is my role model. We worked together for 15 years."

The lifelong Winnipegger and Peretz School graduate began her working career as a junior high school teacher. After staying home to raise her daughters for a few years, she went to work with her late husband in his garment manufacturing business, which was sold in 1997.

As a teen, Cowan was a member of United Synagogue Youth and BBYO. As an adult, her community involvement began through the National Council of Jewish Women. She chaired the NCJW capital campaign that resulted in the building of the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre in the early 1980s. She also served as president of the centre, which provides programming for Jewish seniors, and was vice-president of the NCJW's Winnipeg section.

Her work on behalf of the NCJW led her into further community involvement. She served as president of the Jewish Foundation from 1994 to 1998, during which time the foundation launched its Women's Endowment Fund.

Following her tenure at the foundation, Cowan and her close friend Sandra Secter co-chaired the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign for two years. Most recently, she served as co-chair of the Asper Jewish Community Campus Building on Success Campaign, whose goal was to raise $7 million to expand the seven-year-old building, retire its current debt and create an endowment fund to help pay for its future needs.

Cowan becomes the Jewish Foundation's third CEO. Cohen served for 14 years, leaving the more than 40-year-old foundation with capital assets of nearly $48 million over more than 3,000 funds, making the foundation the second-largest private foundation in Manitoba.

While other foundations require a minimum donation of $1,000 to start a fund, the Jewish Foundation only requires an initial $100.

"The foundation has come a long way since its inception," Cowan said. "My goal is to take it to the next level. I have a plan to take the foundation out into the community in a strong way and add to our capital assets."

Repressive regimes use intimidation to avoid press scrutiny

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The situation in Iraq, including the Jan. 30 election, and the destructive impact of the tsunami in Southeast Asia, continue to dominate the news. Meanwhile, the media all but ignore daily destruction – wrought by man, not nature – in many African and Asian countries.

According to human rights organizations, a staggering two million people – mainly civilians – have been killed by fighting, famine and disease caused by warfare in the past 10 years, while another four million have been internally displaced.

For a relatively short period, the Western media brought their cameras, and the world's eyes, to the carnage in Darfur, Sudan. But almost as soon as a "peace accord" was reached between the Sudanese government and rebel forces in the south, Darfur went back to being mostly ignored. The cameras left but the conflict roiled on.

The New York Times' Lydia Polgreen ("Civilians Bear Brunt of the Continuing Violence in Darfur," Jan. 24) contributed a detailed account of the ongoing strife. Polgreen wrote: "Even as Sudan celebrates the recent end of the 20-year conflict between the country's [Arab-ruled] Muslim north and the mostly Christian south, promising peace throughout this troubled country, the ethnic violence that has devastated villages in the western region of Darfur continues unchecked while the world's eyes are elsewhere."

Polgreen explained that a small African Union "peacekeeping force" has been ineffective in stopping the violence inflicted on the people of Darfur by the Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed. Recently – despite ceasefires – the militants burned 25 villages to the ground, killing hundreds, mostly women and children, and causing thousands to flee "adding to the two million people pushed into tattered camps in Sudan and neighbouring Chad."

Patrick Kavanagh touched on the theme of media inattention in his review of Allah's Torch by Tracy Dahlby (Globe and Mail, Jan. 22). Dahlby's book chronicles his travels in Indonesia, including encounters with various Islamic militant groups.

Indonesia, Kavanagh wrote, "is headquarters to several small but particularly vicious militant Islamist organizations" such as Jemaah Islamiyah, which was responsible for the horrific Bali nightclub bombings in 2002. Parts of the country have received massive media attention because of the tsunami devastation. Yet under Indonesia's partial and nascent democracy (which replaced the previous dictatorship), restrictions on the media still prevent reporting on corruption and militant Islamic groups.

Restrictions facing journalists in Bangladesh were described in Eliza Griswold's gripping account about the rise of militant Islam in that country ("The Next Islamist Revolution?" New York Times Magazine, Jan. 23). Griswold wrote: "Bangladeshi politics have never strayed far from violence. During the war of independence from Pakistan, in 1971, three million people died in nine months. Thuggery has been a consistent feature of political life since then and is increasingly so today."

Griswold noted that local journalists have been frequently imprisoned. Last year, three journalists were killed "while reporting about corruption and the rise of militant Islam," and foreign journalists are intimidated. This explains why so few Western correspondents even try to report from Bangladesh, even though it may be a recruiting ground for Al Qaeda.

Freedom to report is, of course, key to getting a story out to the world. This is one reason why so few meaningful stories emerge from countries with repressive regimes, including Cuba, China, North Korea, Syria, Saudi Arabia and, increasingly, Russia (think Chechnya).

Venue changed for 'Israeli Apartheid Week' rally

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

IsraelFEST 2005, Hillel at the University of Toronto's celebration of Israeli culture, kicked off last Thursday night with a concert by Israeli Ethiopian musician Idan Raichel, attended by more than 800 people.

Although a Jan. 25 news release by the Jewish student group acknowledged "some concerns" that the concurrent Israeli Apartheid Week, organized by the university's Arab Students Collective would "hinder" IsraelFEST, students expected the Hillel event to proceed as planned.

"We acknowledge the rights of other groups to hold events on campus. Along with other student groups, we believe that the campus community at large should be free to consider all viewpoints and draw their own, unbiased conclusions," the release stated.

A subsequent release clarified that Jewish students and Hillel "strongly disagree with the title, tone and objectives of 'Israeli Apartheid Week' in the strongest possible terms," and that its timing is meant to distract from the positive message of IsraelFEST, an annual event instituted more than 20 years ago.

It said that U of T administration had "assured Hillel that any hateful or anti-Semitic statements expressed by the organizers of 'Israeli Apartheid Week' or their guests [would] be dealt with according to the university code of conduct."

The news release asked for the Jewish community's support in what it believes is the appropriate course of action, and noted the "open, respected lines of communication" between Hillel and U of T administration.

As of late last week, an "anti-corporate action" rally that originally called for participants to assemble behind Robarts Library has been moved to King's College Circle.

The original location was adjacent to Hillel's Wolfond Centre, provoking concerns for student safety. Dylan Rae, vice-president, student life, of U of T's Student Administrative Council, said he's "glad common sense prevailed."

Johanna Herman, chair of Hillel at U of T, said the arrangements for the new venue are "probably what should have happened in the first place. That's where most rallies happen. I'm glad everyone co-operated."

The university did not cancel Israeli Apartheid Week because of its "commitment to freedom of speech," according to a statement issued two weeks ago by David Farrar, deputy provost and vice-provost, students.

Jonathan Jaffit, president of Betar-Tagar at U of T, said late last week he commends the administration for its role in changing the venue, but added that his organization, the campus wing of Herut-Likud Canada, would continue to pressure the administration to cancel the rally and in fact the whole event, which he termed a "vehicle for hate speech."

Betar-Tagar students plan to attend the Arab student event to offer a counter-view.

Tilly Shames, Hillel's Israel Affairs director, noted that Hillel staff and students will also be monitoring Israeli Apartheid Week events.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Keep it simple when preparing for Super Bowl

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The Super Bowl has become one of the biggest, most extravagant sporting events in North America, but feeding friends during the game can be kept simple.

We always serve platters of veggies, three kinds of pretzels and eight kinds of chips. Needless to say, you must have dips to go with all the munchies.

The following recipes are all tried and true favourites of our friends and family. All the recipes can be doubled or tripled. You can also substitute low or no fat or even the non-dairy sour cream and cream cheeses to reduce the calorie content.

ZESTY DILL AND PEPPER DIP

1 8-oz. pkg. cream cheese, softened
½ cup sour cream
3 tbsp. prepared horseradish
2 tbsp. fresh dill, chopped
1 tbsp. coarse ground mustard
2 tsp. red pepper hot sauce

In a food processor or blender combine the cream cheese, sour cream, horseradish, dill, mustard and red pepper sauce and mix until combined. Makes about 1½ cups.
Suggested dippers: veggies, fish sticks, pita chips, corn or potato chips.

SWEET AND SOUR DIPPING SAUCE

¼ cup red currant jelly
¼ cup ketchup
2 tbsp. spicy mustard
few drops liquid red pepper sauce, if desired

Combine all the ingredients in small saucepan, stirring with fork or whisking to blend. Heat to simmering then remove the sauce from the heat. Serve warm. Makes ½ cup sauce.
Suggested dippers: miniature egg rolls or chicken wings or strips.

ORIENTAL DIPPING SAUCE

⅓ cup dark soy sauce
1 tsp. ginger, minced
2 tsp. sesame oil
½ tsp. sugar
⅓ cup rice vinegar
3 tsp. garlic, minced
1 tsp. chili oil

Combine all ingredients and let stand 10 minutes to blend. Makes about 1 cup.
Suggested dippers: miniature egg rolls or chicken wings or strips.

PRETZEL DIPPING SAUCE

½ cup Dijon-style mustard
½ cup mayonnaise
1 tsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. garlic powder
hot pepper sauce (optional)

In a small bowl, combine all the ingredients and mix well. Cover and chill for at least 1 hour. Serve with hot pretzels or mini-hot dogs. Makes 1 cup.

CREAMY RED PEPPER DIP

1 package cream cheese, softened
8 oz. sour cream
8 oz. sharp cheddar cheese, grated
1 fresh jalapeno pepper, seeded and finely chopped
1 red pepper seeded and finely chopped
1 clove garlic, minced
½ tsp. ground cumin

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine all the ingredients and mix well. Cover and refrigerate until ready to serve. Makes about 2½ to 3 cups.

QUICK AND EZ PIZZA DIP

1 8-oz. pkg. cream cheese
5 tsp. pizza seasoning, divided
⅛ tsp. garlic powder
2 cups shredded mozzarella cheese
1 can (8 oz.) tomato sauce
¼ cup chopped red or green bell pepper
2 tbsp. chopped onion

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl combine the cream cheese, 2 teaspoons pizza seasoning and garlic powder and mix until blended. Spread the mixture on the bottom of 9-inch glass pie plate. Top with 1 cup mozzarella cheese. In a bowl combine the tomato sauce and the remaining tablespoon of pizza seasoning. Pour the tomato sauce mixture over the layer of cheese. Sprinkle the top of the tomato sauce with the chopped pepper and onion and then top with the remaining cheese. Bake at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes or until heated through and cheese is melted, or microwave for 5 minutes until the mixture is bubbly. Serve with breadsticks. Makes 10 servings.

CHEESECAKE DIP

2 cups softened cream cheese
½ cup whipping cream
½ tsp. vanilla extract
¼ cup brown sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. lemon juice
½ cup raisins
½ cup mini chocolate chips (can use milk or semi-sweet or mini M&Ms)

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the cream cheese and whipping cream and mix until well blended and smooth. Add the vanilla, mixing well. Blend in the brown sugar, cinnamon and lemon juice. Add the raisins and chocolate chips and mix them in by hand Spoon the dip into a serving bowl and garnish with a light dusting of cinnamon or graham cracker crumbs. Serve at room temperature. Makes nearly 4 cups.
Dipping suggestions: apple slices, graham crackers, strawberries, pound cake slices.

Testing virtually eliminates Tay-Sachs among Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Tay-Sachs, one of the best-known Jewish genetic diseases, has been almost completely eradicated among Jews, says Robert Desnick of the department of human genetics at New York's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Tay-Sachs is a fatal genetic disorder that causes progressive destruction of the central nervous system. Children affected by it seldom live beyond the age of four. While it occurs in other ethnic groups, it is most common in Ashkenazi Jews.

In 2003, there were no Jewish babies born in North America with Tay-Sachs, Desnick says in a report on his findings in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

Joel Zlotogora, head of the Israel Health Ministry's department of community genetics, says in the same article that just one baby was born with Tay-Sachs in Israel in 2003. It appears that none was born last year, although since symptoms don't usually appear for several months, that figure may change.

Credit for the decline appears to go to the extensive genetic testing carried out on couples planning to marry, or in early pregnancy. If the disease is found, the pregnancy is frequently terminated.

Dor Yesharim, a haredi organization based in New York, carries out genetic testing for Tay-Sachs, as well as Canavan disease and cystic fibrosis, on young people in the community. When a couple starts to date, or plans to start to date, Dor Yesharim informs them if the marriage could possibly result in an affected child.

Tay-Sachs is classified as an autosomal recessive disease, which means that both parents must be carriers, although neither has the illness. Each pregnancy has a one in four chance of producing an affected child, a 50 per cent chance of producing a carrier (someone who carries the gene, but does not have the disease) and only one in four of producing a child who neither has the disease nor is a carrier.

There are other diseases that affect mainly Ashkenazi Jews, including Type A Niemann-Pick, a neurodegenerative disorder; Gaucher, a neurological disease; Fanconi anemia, a blood disorder; familial dysautonomia, which leads to abnormal development of the nervous system; and Canavan, where there is a progressive loss of the white matter of the brain, through which nerve impulses are sent to other parts of the brain or the spinal cord.

The success of Dor Yesharim comes from the cultural mores of the haredi community. Young men and women by and large do not date for social reasons, but only to find a spouse. The person who arranges a meeting, either a friend, family member or shadchan, tells each family about the potential match. The families then decide whether the couple should meet. It is at this point, before emotions and hopes are involved, that the Dor Yesharim databank is checked and the couple is told, not the individual genetic status, but rather if the marriage could produce an affected child.

Many Orthodox secondary schools, including those in Canada, test their students and send the data to the New York headquarters of the organization.

In regular circles, the possibility of hurt and disappointment is much greater. What happens if a couple is already engaged, or close to being engaged and discovers that they are carriers? Do they take a chance that they will have a "normal" baby? Do they plan to test each pregnancy to see if it is affected? And if it is, do they abort? Suppose they don't believe in abortion?

Or do they get married at all? Do they get pregnant at all? Do they adopt?

There are also some diseases that affect Sephardi Jews, although not as many. Among them are Machado Joseph disease (MJD), a fatal disorder of the nervous system; beta-thalassemia, a blood disorder; and Mediterranean fever, a rheumatic disease. As a point of interest, MJD, which occurs among the Portuguese, has recently been found to be an indicator that the sufferer is of Marrano origin.

Theoretically, a marriage between an Ashkenazi and a Sephardi should be genetically safe. However, this is not necessarily so. Tay-Sachs, for instance, while rare in Sephardi circles, is not unknown. Also, with increased intermarriage, it is possible for two half-Sephardi or half-Ashkenazi people, both carriers of a certain gene, to marry and have a child with a genetic disorder.

Do you have trouble staying asleep?

A research study is currently being conducted by

for individuals who are experiencing sleep problems throughout the night. Interested participants considered must be:

- Men and women age 50 years or older;
- Awake for at least 1 hour, four or more nights per week;
- Able to spend three daytime visits and five overnight visits at clinic.

Study related care is provided at no charge to study participants. This would include physical exam, sleep exams, laboratory services, and study medication.

Pioneer overcomes resistance to Sunday blood donor clinic

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Think blood. Think life. Think mitzvah. That is Anna VanDelman's philosophy.

She has a dream – to establish annual Sunday blood donor clinics at synagogues and temples around the world.

"When my 90-year-old mother, Ida Gold, was ill, she refused to accept a life-saving blood donation. She said that the blood should be given to younger people as there was a blood shortage," VanDelman says.

To convince her mother to accept the blood transfusion, VanDelman said to her, "I will return tenfold the amount of blood you need."

She asked Canadian Blood Services to hold a blood donor clinic on Sunday, a day on which they weren't held. She argued that Saturdays were out of the question for many Jews and most working people were unable to come in the evening.

In 2000, VanDelman got approval for a Sunday blood donor clinic. It was held at her synagogue, the Beth David Congregation, and was a project of Beth Tikvah's social action committee.

"The clinic was an overwhelming success," she says. She notes that each unit of blood given has the potential to serve four people.

But then, she says, she had to "fight with them for three years to make this happen again because until recently, they told me again and again that Sunday was not an option."

When Canadian Blood Services told her that Sunday was the Lord's Day and they could not hold a clinic, she replied, "What better work to do on the Lord's Day?"

VanDelman's dedication and persistence paid off. In October 2004, a blood donor clinic was organized in the Bayview corridor. Along with Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Temple Emanu-El, Temple Har Zion, Kehillat Shaarei Torah and Beth Rayim Synagogue participated.

Each synagogue involved dedicated the clinic in memory of one of its own members.

Some people at the clinic were first-time donors and others had given blood before. Ruth Belick made her 126th donation. Keyboardist Shaya Petroff, who had recently donated blood for the 100th time, played soothing Yiddish melodies. People of all ages – three generations – attended.

VanDelman says that the need for blood has not diminished over the years but the number of potential donors has decreased significantly. "This is because there are tighter screening procedures to reduce health risks."

Canadian Blood Services has now approved a plan to permit annual Pikuach Nefesh Sundays (Saving a Life Sundays).

"This is a step towards fulfilling my dream, that every synagogue in the world will hold a Pikuach Nefesh Sunday. Perhaps the next will be in the Bathurst corridor and then hopefully expand to other areas," says VanDelman.

Anna VanDelman, who founded the Pikuach Nefesh Sunday blood donor clinic, is seen with her mother, Ida Gold.

Gordon Sher, CEO of Canadian Blood Services, said that the "demand for blood and blood products continues to go up…

"Canadians are much more confident in the safety and security of the blood supply in Canada than they were five years ago." He noted that only 3.7 per cent of eligible people in Canada donate blood.

Sher says the reasons most commonly given for people not donating blood are lack of time and inconvenient locations. "Canadian Blood Services is trying to accommodate donors by having clinics in convenient locations and extending clinic hours to evenings and weekends."

For more information on establishing a Pikuach Nefesh Sunday blood donor clinic, call Anna VanDelman, 416-638-3342.

Israeli satirist Ephraim Kishon dead at 80

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Unbowed by the horrors of the Holocaust, Ephraim Kishon immigrated to Israel and became his adopted country's most beloved humorist.

Obituary

But Kishon died in semi-exile Saturday at 80, driven back to Europe by the same outsider sensibility that made for such great Israeli satire.

"With a sharp wit, both favourably and critically, Kishon set before us an exact mirror from which the ups and downs, fears, arts and opinions of Israeli culture could be seen," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said in a eulogy broadcast over Israeli media Sunday.

"The painful fact was that for many years Kishon felt rejected by the Israeli cultural establishment" Sharon told his cabinet. "But his monumental cultural works remain with us and with future generations. Thus we will remember him."

"He often said there was a clique of sabras who were against him because he was from Hungary," wrote actor Haim Topol in Yediot Achronot.

Ephraim Kishon

Kishon died of a heart attack in his second home in Switzerland, where he had enjoyed material comfort and renown earned from books that were translated into 37 languages.

A Hungarian who survived Nazi labour camps, he always enjoyed the irony that his urbane, dry humour – much of it Seinfeld-style riffs on family life – had found a ready audience in Germany.

They used to ask him how he could succeed in Germany of all places, his son, Raphael Kishon, told Army Radio. "He would reply: 'It's a wonderful feeling to know that the children of my executioners admire me and read my books."

Soon after arriving in Israel in 1949, Kishon taught himself Hebrew and was given the satire column in Ma'ariv. Several successful books followed, including So Sorry We Won!, in which Kishon mounted a spirited defence of Israel's triumphs in the 1967 Six-Day War, which were already drawing criticism in some parts of Europe.

In the 1960s, he began working in Israel's cinema and scored major coups for a nascent national industry.

He wrote and directed The Policeman and Sallah Shabati, both bittersweet social satires that were nominated for Academy Awards in the best foreign film category.

Sallah, about the trials and tribulations of North African immigrants, shot Topol to stardom years before he appeared as Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof.

"Ephraim was a comic genius of an international calibre," Israeli opposition leader Yosef Lapid, Kishon's lifelong friend, told Israel Radio.

Kishon won the Israel Prize for his life's work in 2002. He was to be flown back to Israel for burial. "It is a country where nobody expects miracles, but everybody takes them for granted," Kishon once wrote.

Holocaust remembered, but anti-Semitism not understood

1930s' Stalin-imposed famine, when millions of Ukrainians died.

Who could have foreseen that Putin would in turn admit that anti-Semitism persists in his own country, and that he would then go take his seat next to Aleksander Kwasniewski, the president of the Republic of Poland, to commemorate a moment in time that initiated the bitter occupation of Poland by Russia?

Sixty years ago, who would have dreamed that the president of the State of Israel, an Iranian-born Jew, would be in Krakow to place a candle on the monument dedicated to the victims of Auschwitz-Birkenau?

But politics sometimes facilitates the unthinkable, and current events often realign world powers into new partnerships. Immediately after the war, survivors waited for years in refugee camps, while the world sat silently. Now, Canadians, Europeans and Americans are willing to remember the anti-Semitism and racism of the World War II era and discuss its current manifestations.

In his speech, Putin alluded to a letter he had just received, signed by 500 Russians, including nationalist members of the Duma (Parliament), accusing Jews of fomenting ethnic hatred and demanding that all Jewish organizations be outlawed. Putin, who is currently fighting Chechen terrorists, also declared, "We shall not only remember the past but also be aware of all the threats of the modern world. Terrorism is among them, and it is no less dangerous and cunning than fascism."

He added that just "as there were no good and bad fascists there cannot be good and bad terrorists."

Yet, the day before officials assembled on the grounds of the largest Nazi concentration and death camp, Poles and Germans were still arguing over how to describe Auschwitz-Birkenau.

On Jan. 26, German and Polish deputies met in the European Parliament in Brussels to debate whether the word "German" could be used to describe the camps. Poland, which was occupied by Germany, was offended by the fact that the international press was referring to Auschwitz-Birkenau as a Polish camp. Germany, on the other hand, argued that the word Nazi should be used instead of German. In the end, a compromise was reached – it was agreed that Auschwitz would be described as a "German Nazi death camp."

The next day, Kwasniewski spoke of "Nazi death factories."

"This place presents in its terrible entirety what Nazism really was," he said. He spoke about the Poles as victims of a Nazi occupation that brought to an end "the special bond connecting us with the Jewish people," referring to a long history of Polish Jewish culture and a prewar period during which the urban population of Poland was about 30 per cent Jewish.

For hundreds of years Jewish academics, artists, actors, farmers, business and tradespeople lived in Polish cities and shtetls. Before the war, the richness of Jewish life was almost unprecedented compared to other European countries. Polish Jews were proud of their heritage and the culture they had created, and official Poland looks back in pride on that period.

And yet on the streets of the old town in downtown Warsaw, there are dolls for sale – chassidic-looking men holding moneybags at their sides and Polish zlotys in their hands. Members of the small Jewish community in Warsaw have complained about the dolls and are told they just don't have a sense of humour. The Holocaust is remembered in Poland today, but anti-Semitism, it would seem, is not yet fully understood.

Hamas, Hezbollah sign pact against Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — Hezbollah and Hamas have agreed to continue their resistance against Israel despite U.S. pressure on the groups, a Hezbollah statement said Sunday.

The agreement came in a meeting between Hamas leader Khaled Mashal and Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah at the Nasrallah's office in Beirut.

The talks covered developments in the Arab region, "particularly pressure to which the resistance and steadfastness forces in Syria and Lebanon are subjected through [UN] Resolution 1559 and in Palestine through the continuing [Israeli] aggression on the Palestinian people," the statement said.

"Agreement was reached that the resistance and steadfastness option is the only option in confronting the current pressure," it said.

UN Resolution 1559, passed last September, calls for the dismantling of Hezbollah and armed Palestinian groups and a withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon.

Lebanon and Hezbollah rejected the resolution, saying it contained Israeli demands.

It was not immediately known whether a proposed Palestinian truce with Israel was discussed by Mashal and Nasrallah. Mashal said last week that his group is prepared to accept a temporary conditional truce with Israel.

On Saturday, Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Shaath announced in Damascus that Hamas and Islamic Jihad, another militant group based in Syria, have committed to a temporary ceasefire with Israel, but only if the Jewish state halts attacks on Palestinian areas and releases Palestinian prisoners.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad are responsible for killing scores of Israelis in suicide bombings.

Describing Hamas' relationship with Hezbollah as "strong," Mashal told reporters after meeting Nasrallah, "We are partners in this march of confronting a common enemy. In the same way south Lebanon was liberated, we have hope that all of Palestine will be liberated."

Sharon satisfied with Abbas

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon praised Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for reining in violence. "There is no doubt that [Abbas] has begun to work," Sharon told Yediot Achronot, referring to the PA leader's ceasefire talks with terror groups in Gaza. "I am very satisfied with what I hear is happening on the Palestinian side, and I have a serious interest in advancing the peace process with him." But Sharon said Israel must not let down its guard. "I intend to be accommodating with [Abbas] while remaining vigilant and assessing the situation on their side."

Sharon, Mubarak speak

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon spoke Thursday with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who phoned to congratulate him on the positive atmosphere in the region in the wake of dialogue with the Palestinians. Mubarak said Egypt is ready to help in advancing the peace process. The two agreed to stay in close touch and to enhance bilateral relations.

Eyeing Mossad from abroad

Fewer than a third of would-be spies who browse the Mossad website are Israelis. Limor Friedman, head of the Internet section in the Government Advertising Bureau, said that of 1 million people who visited the intelligence service's site since it was launched last year, only 31 per cent were from Israel. Almost a quarter were from North America and Western Europe, she said, but only some three per cent from Arab nations or Iran, possibly a reflection of restrictions on Web access in those countries. The Hebrew and English-language versions of the site can be found at www.mossad.gov.il.

Hamas trounces Fatah

Hamas won an overwhelming victory in Gaza Strip local elections, final results showed Friday. Hamas won control of seven of the 10 municipal councils that held votes. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party won the other three councils. The first-ever municipal elections in Gaza, held last week, were seen as a test of strength between the Islamic group and Abbas. Hamas won 75 out of the 118 seats in the 10 local councils, while the ruling Fatah party won 39 seats.

Syria confirms missile sale

Syrian President Bashar Assad confirmed Syria is trying to buy Russian anti-aircraft missiles, saying they're for self-defence. "This is a defensive, air defence weapon," he said during a visit to Moscow. "If Israel is against us buying it, it means it wants to invade our airspace. The Israeli stance is illogical." Russia previously denied Israeli reports that it planned to sell Syria an undisclosed number of SA-18 shoulder-fired missiles. Israel fears they could find their way into the hands of Syrian-backed Hezbollah or Palestinian terror groups funded by Damascus.

Rice to Middle East

Condoleezza Rice will visit the Middle East next month. Rice, who has just been confirmed as U.S. Secretary of State, plans to visit the region at the beginning of February, David Satterfield, the deputy assistant secretary of state, said last week. Such a visit would be Rice's first in her new job. She said during recent confirmation hearings that she would devote "enormous effort" to bringing about Israeli-Palestinian peace.

World leaders gather in Auschwitz 60 years after liberation

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU — Israel's President Moshe Katsav asked at a ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of the camp's liberation last Thursday whether the memory of the Holocaust had lost its power to deter further acts of anti-Semitism.

"We see the shacks, the boulevards and the final stop of the railroad tracks from all over Europe. It feels as though we still hear the cries of the victims," he said. "We are witnessing an awakening of anti-Semitism in Europe. Has the Holocaust's deterrent force waned?"

More than 40 heads of state, including Russian President Vladimir Putin and French President Jacques Chirac, gathered in Auschwitz, along with survivors and liberators, to commemorate the anniversary. In attendance from Canada were the president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ed Morgan; Auschwitz survivor and former chair of CJC's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, Nate Leipciger, and Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson.

About 2,000 Holocaust survivors attended the ceremony at Auschwitz, which began with the sound of a train whistle to signify the mode in which Jews were brought to the camp.

German President Horst Koehler remained silent throughout the ceremony, as an acknowledgment of his country's responsibility under Adolf Hitler for the Holocaust.

Auschwitz-Birkenau, the most infamous of the Nazi extermination camps, was liberated by the Soviet army on January 27, 1945.

Last Thursday in Krakow, world leaders joined survivors and liberators in a special forum in Krakow's Slovacki Theatre ahead of the main ceremony in Auschwitz.

Putin acknowledged that anti-Semitism and xenophobia had surfaced in Russia, which is tackling an issue that the Kremlin had long failed to confront directly.

Putin said that many in the world should be ashamed of new manifestations of anti-Semitism six decades after the defeat of fascism.

"Even in our country, in Russia, which did more than any to combat fascism, for the victory over fascism, which did most to save the Jewish people, even in our country we sometimes unfortunately see manifestations of this problem and I, too, am ashamed of that," Putin said, to long applause.

Russian Jews earlier had expressed hope that Putin would use the occasion to address the issue of anti-Semitism. Earlier this month, a group of nationalist Russian lawmakers called for an investigation aimed at outlawing all Jewish organizations and punishing officials who support them, accusing Jews of fomenting ethnic hatred and saying they provoke anti-Semitism.

Addressing world leaders and Holocaust survivors at the morning forum in Krakow, Katsav said Europe must educate its people about the Holocaust.

"We call upon the European Union – do not let Nazism dwell in the imaginations of the young generations as a 'horror' show, so to speak," Katsav said.

"We fear anti-Semitism," said the president. "We fear Holocaust denial, we fear a distorted approach by the youth of Europe. We fear a distorted approach that the youth of Europe might develop towards their past."

Katsav also said World War II allies have failed to do enough to protect the Jews of Europe and prevent the Holocaust. "The Holocaust is not only a tragedy of the Jewish people. It is a failure of humanity as a whole.

"The Allies did not do enough to stop the Holocaust, to stop the destruction of the Jewish people. The allies knew about the destruction of the Jews of Europe; the allies did not take any initiative to prevent the destruction of European Jewry."

Katsav said destroying Auschwitz, or the railroad tracks that led to the camp, from the air "could have saved many hundreds of thousands of Jews from the gas chambers."

Maj. Anatoly Shapiro, who commanded the unit that captured the camp, opened the ceremony in the Krakow theater.

More than 10,000 guests and 1,600 journalists came from around the world to Krakow, some 60 kilometers from the camp, filling every hotel in the city.

"I'm closing a circle," said one of the survivors. "I've returned after 60 years. I haven't been able to sleep for two weeks."

Dan Arad, an 83-year-old Israel Defence Forces pensioner and the author of a book called Surviving Auschwitz, came with his wife from Haifa. He feels lucky. He was at Auschwitz-3, a forced labour camp, where "the fit and healthy were sent," he said.

"Conditions were good there. Each person had a bed. We had money in the form of coupons. We could trade with the Polish prisoners. They used it for prostitutes and we got bread in exchange."

"I spent six weeks at Birkenau, until [Josef] Mengele came to our barracks and looked at me. I still looked pretty good and he sent me to Auschwitz-3."

Some 1.5 million people perished in Auschwitz-Birkenau, more than one million of them Jews. When the Soviet army arrived to liberate the camp, they found only 7,000 survivors, many of them barely alive. The retreating Nazis had driven most of the prisoners who still had strength to walk out into the snow, on a "death march" toward camps farther west.

For the full text of the address given by the president of the State of Israel, Moshe Katsav, at the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, see page 9.

Palestinian anti-Semitism poses danger

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It's no secret that media in the Palestinian Authority, as in much of the Muslim world, depict Jews in a way that would not have been out of place in the most anti-Semitic of Nazi publications.

"As in Nazi Germany, there is an entire culture of hatred in Palestinian society today, from textbooks to crossword puzzles, from day camps to TV music videos. And calling for the murder of Jews, as Jews, is the end result," said Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs, at a news conference last week at which a report by Palestinian Media Watch on anti-Semitism in the Palestinian Authority was presented.

Palestinian Media Watch scrutinizes local media for anti-Jewish and anti-Israeli bias. Some Middle East experts are critical of the organization, charging that it distorts a situation that, even without exaggeration, is grave enough. But others defend its scholarship.

"Palestinian anti-Semitism has intensified in the past few years," Hebrew University professor Menahem Milson told JTA. "This is so because the media has become more sophisticated, particularly satellite TV and the Internet."

Milson, a professor of Arabic literature, is the academic adviser for the Jerusalem-based Middle East Media Research Institute, which monitors Arabic-language media.

> The best way to fight ... anti-Semitism is to expose it

Anti-Semitic messages also are spread through popular books, textbooks and political statements. Demonizing Israelis in particular and Jews in general serves to legitimize acts of terrorism, experts say.

Palestinian Media Watch director Itamar Marcus told JTA that "we receive from Palestinian society three messages – the Jew is essentially wicked, therefore he is dangerous to us and to the world, and therefore we need to fight against him."

In the run-up to recent Palestinian Authority presidential elections, PLO chief and eventual winner Mahmoud Abbas met with the head of the Palestian Authority and asked him to check all programs aired on PA television to prevent the broadcast of inciting material.

Marcus conceded that nationalistic programming calling for violence against Israel has decreased somewhat, but said anti-Semitic rhetoric depicting the Jews as subhuman, dangerous creatures has even increased.

Sharansky said the Palestinians have upgraded the conflict from a political stalemate over borders to "a battle of God against the Jews."

Palestinians said that wasn't the case.

"We oppose incitement. We don't believe incitement leads to anything. We are just covering events," Radwan Abu-Ayyash, director-general of the Palestine Broadcasting Authority, told JTA.

But he added that on talk shows "people talk freely. We cannot always predict what those people might say, and we cannot censor the sheik in the mosque because it is against our religion."

Palestinian media adjust to fit the mood on the street and the political directives coming from above. Thus, under the late PA president Yasser Arafat, strong incitement against the Jews was welcome. With Abbas in charge, the atmosphere seems to be changing.

Abbas himself used to indulge such anti-Semitism, Milson pointed out. Abbas' doctoral dissertation, written in 1984 at Moscow's Institute of Oriental Studies, minimized the number of Holocaust dead and claimed that Zionists collaborated with the Nazis to annihilate the Jews of Europe.

Though it's possible to change the tone of the media fairly quickly, it takes much longer to change textbooks – and Palestinian textbooks are full of anti-Israel propaganda.

A new book teaches sixth-graders what they must do for "occupied Palestine," their "stolen homeland".

Hebrew University's Milson is convinced that the best way to fight Arab and Muslim anti-Semitism is to expose it, because Arab opinion leaders are sensitive to criticism from the West.

Every Canadian loves a challenge, right?

On average, each Canadian produces five tonnes of greenhouse gases a year. Driving, heating and cooling our homes, using appliances... almost anything we do that uses fossil fuels for energy also creates greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions. And these emissions are causing our climate to change.

Take the One-Tonne Challenge – reduce your energy use and your GHG emissions by 20%, or one tonne. You'll save money, and help to protect our climate and our air quality.

SOLOMON THE WISE

based on the I Kings 3:5-28

Solomon lay in his bed, thinking. Now that his father, King David, had passed away, he was the new king over the entire Jewish nation. And he was still just a boy...Gradually, he drifted off to sleep.

"SOLOMON!"

Who could that be? "Yes?"

"I am God who has chosen you to be king. Make a request and I shall grant it."

Whoa, thought Solomon. I could ask for money, happiness, power. But will that help me be a better king? He realized what he had to ask for.

"G-d...I'm so young...I don't know how to choose what is right for Israel. Please give me the wisdom I need to be a good king."

"Good choice, Solomon, good choice. You could have asked for a long life, or for money. You could have asked me to kill all your enemies. But you asked for wisdom. Good choice.

"Behold, I have given you the wisdom you asked for, wisdom greater than anyone before you has ever possessed, greater that anyone ever will have. Also I have given you things you did not ask for. Wealth, long life...you will be the greatest king of all. But remember to follow my laws and do what is right, as your father David did."

"King Solomon, wake up! You've got a busy day ahead of you! There's a difficult case waiting for you in the chambers. Nobody knows what to do."

It had just been a dream. Or had it?

* * * * *

Solomon sat on his golden throne. Two women stood before him. One clutched a wailing baby in her arms.

"Your Majesty, please have mercy on me, and don't let her steal my son," pleaded the woman holding the baby.

"Liar!" shouted the second woman. "He's my child!"

"Silence," demanded Solomon. "You," gesturing to the woman without a baby, "what's the problem?"

"Well, Your Highness, the two of us run an inn together. I had a baby, and three days later she did too. But her son died last night, and she took my child instead, putting her dead son in his place. I woke up this morning with a dead baby next to me, but it wasn't mine. It was hers! She stole my son!"

"You're such a liar!" burst in the first woman, clutching the baby more tightly. "He's my son!"

"No he's mine!"

Solomon thought to himself. He knew what he had to do.

"Bring a sword!" he declared. "We'll cut the baby in half and they'll split him."

Everyone was aghast, but you have to listen to the king, so a courtier ran and fetched a huge, shiny sword.

"No!" screamed the second woman. "Let her keep him, but don't kill him!"

"Here, take him and cut him up!" demanded the first.

Solomon glared at her. "No mother would do that to her baby. He turned to the second woman. You must be the real mother. Take your son and go."

And everybody realized that Solomon really did have incredible wisdom.

Young girl finds kindness and intolerance in Canada

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

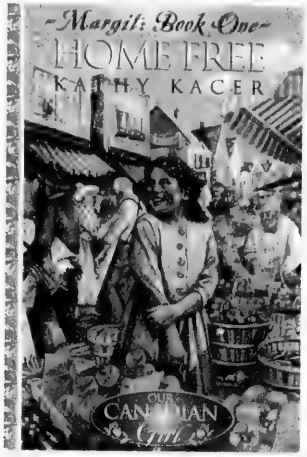
Jews who managed to escape Nazi Germany and come to Canada were very lucky. After all, in Canada they were safe from persecution and murder. Even here, however, things were not perfect.

Kathy Kacer, who has written a number of books about children in the Holocaust, including Gabi's Dresser and Night Spies, has written a fascinating story about a young girl in just this position. Called Home Free (Penguin Canada, 2003), it tells the story of Margit, an 11-year-old girl from Czechoslovakia who is allowed to come to Canada with her mother in 1944.

Her father has been taken away by the Nazis

Her father has been taken away by the Nazis, and they have no idea where he is – or even if he is still alive. After a long, exhausting trip, they arrive in Toronto. Everything is strange – the language, the clothes, the food. Luckily, some cousins, Esther and Joseph, who already live in Toronto, find them an apartment, and help get them settled.

While shopping in Kensington Market, which at that time was the centre of Jewish life, Margit is accused of stealing fruit from a cart. Alice, a girl of about her own age, saves her (the embarrassed merchant gives the girls bags of dried fruit in apology) and becomes her friend. She is even in the same class in school, and becomes Margit's protector.



And she did need protection. While a lot of her classmates were very nice, some, like Ellen, called her names and told her she had no right to be there. They also claimed that the war was the fault of the Jews. This was not exactly unusual in those days. Unfortunately, some people still feel that way.

Margit was very hurt, as you can imagine. She was also hurt when some of the kids in her class laughed at her because her English was poor. Her teacher, Miss McCaul, who was very kind, suggested that instead of doing the regular work, Margit should concentrate on writing her thoughts and experiences in a journal.

Margit was thrilled, and poured her emotions and memories onto the pages. The teacher was so impressed that she asked her to read her work to the class.

Margit was terrified. In Prague, Jews had learned to keep quiet, to make sure they didn't do anything to be noticed. After all, the more you were noticed, the more likely you were to be arrested, and they didn't quite know just what happened when people were taken away. Information about the concentration camps was just starting to be known.

Margit thought that now the kids in the class would really hate her. Instead, they stood up and cheered her. Many said they understood what their relatives and friends who were in the army were fighting for.

All except Ellen. She said that Margit was "still a stupid Jew."

In the middle of all this, Margit's mother had a baby (she was pregnant when they came to Canada, but hid the news because she was afraid they wouldn't be allowed into the country.) They named the baby Jack – a good Canadian name, they thought. Margit helped her mother take care of Jack and loved making him laugh.

Finally the war was over. The whole city celebrated for two days. There were parades, religious services and flags.

One day, the best thing happened. They got a letter that said: " I'm alive and I'm coming home to you. Love, Papa."

As book endings go, that has to be one of the best.

Home Free is part of a series of books called Our Canadian Girl. Each book tells about a girl from a different time and a different part of Canada.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Natalie Portman among Jews up for Oscars

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli-born actress Natalie Portman and British director Mike Leigh head this year's list of Jewish Oscar nominees.

Screenwriter Charlie Kaufman also received a nod.

And a short documentary about Sister Rose Thering, a Roman Catholic nun who has devoted her life to fighting anti-Semitism, won a nomination as well.

Portman, born in Jerusalem and the granddaughter of Holocaust survivors, was nominated for best supporting actress for her role in Closer, a look at love and betrayal in contemporary London. She won a Golden Globe for best supporting actress in the film.

Discovered at the age of 11, Portman made her Broadway debut in the title role of The Diary of Anne Frank, and shot to movie fame as Queen Amidala in Star Wars: Episode One — The Phantom Menace.

Her latest project is an Israeli movie by director Amos Gitai. He said last week that filming was about to begin on Free Zone, in which the Jerusalem-born Portman plays one of three women involved in selling cars between Israel and Jordan.

"In this film, she speaks both Hebrew and English," Gitai, who has won accolades for his politically charged work, told Israeli Army Radio. "Obviously, she understood that the terms would not be the same as on a Hollywood movie, but she was very keen to get involved."

Leigh, best known for his penetrating working-class dramas, was nominated for directing Vera Drake, focusing on a warm-hearted back-street abortionist. He was a longtime member of Habonim, a labour Zionist youth movement, and has spoken fondly of his time there.

Kaufman was nominated in the best original screenplay category for the romantic comedy Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind. His most notable past credits include Being John Malkovich and Adaptation.

Sister Rose's Passion, a short film by Oren Jacoby and Steve Kalafer, is about the life and work of the nun, a professor emerita at New Jersey's Seton Hall University, where she helped establish the school's graduate department of Jewish-Christian studies. Thering, who has gone to Israel more than 30 times, is a strong and vocal supporter of the Jewish state.

Germany's Downfall, which dramatizes the last 10 days of Hitler's life in a Berlin bunker and has raised controversy for humanizing the Nazi dictator, was one of five finalists for best foreign-language film.

Veteran director Sidney Lumet will receive an honorary Academy Award for his life work at the Feb. 27 Oscars ceremonies in Hollywood's Kodak Theater.

The synagogues, all still active today, were established early in the 20th century. Burley was drawn to this project by the beauty of the buildings and his curiosity about why so few of them are left. Of some 30 synagogues built in downtown Toronto before 1930, only the six in the exhibition remain open today. Constructed by immigrant communities in difficult economic times, these modest buildings played an important role in Toronto's development as a major urban centre by creating a focus for a community that grew exponentially in the first part of the century.

Burley, a teacher at Ryerson University's School of Image Arts, has been photographing buildings for more than 20 years. The exhibition runs Feb. 3 to May 21 at the Eric Arthur Gallery, Faculty of Architecture, Landscape and Design, U of T, 230 College St., Toronto. 416-978-5038, www.ald.utoronto.ca.

Greenberg featured on multi-disc release of Jewish music

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Helen Medwedeff Greenberg's song cycle Froyen Shtimme has been selected by the Milken Project to be included in its release of some 60 recordings of works by American Jewish composers.

Greenberg, who is from Toronto, has composed a large body of secular and liturgical works mainly for voice and piano. She was born in Baltimore, Md., which makes her eligible to be included in the project.

The Milken Project, established by the Milken family of California, records and distributes unreleased works of well-known Jewish composers such as Kurt Weil, Sam Adler and Leonard Bernstein and music by little- known Jewish composers on the Naxos label.

"I fall into the little-known Jewish composers," says Greenberg, 65, who recently released a CD of her compositions titled Magic Breath.

The CD includes art songs in English, Yiddish and Hebrew, and features soprano Margaret Burton of Minneapolis and pianist Elizabeth Acher, whose many credits include a stint as the keyboardist for Phantom of the Opera.

Some of the 21 songs on Magic Breath are from poems, including A Vinterlid by Avrom Leisen, Shiru Ladonai from Psalm 96, When You Are Old by W. B. Yeats and Magic Breath by Carole H. Leckner.

"Magic Breath represents the realization of a long-held dream of recording some of my music for voice and piano," says Greenberg. "The magnificent poetry for which the music was composed provided creative inspiration for me."

She praises the late composer Srul Irving Glick, "my composition teacher extraordinaire, my mentor and friend. I owe him a huge debt of gratitude." She also studied with composers Oskar Morawetz and Edward Laufer.

Greenberg's compositions include song cycles, single songs, a cappella works and accompanied choral pieces. She has also composed for solo wind instruments with piano.

Her music has been performed throughout Canada and in the United States, Europe and Israel. It has been featured at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

In 1992, commissioned by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Greenberg wrote the Yiddish song Royt Knospn Oyfn Shney (Red Petals on the Snow) for voice and piano. Commissioned by the sisterhood of Holy Blossom Temple in 1996, she composed a setting of Hannah's Prayer for voice and piano in honour of the temple's 75th anniversary.

Greenberg's music is part of the repertoire of cantorial students at Hebrew Union College and Gratz College, and is included in studies offered by Canada's Contemporary Showcase, the Royal Conservatory of Music and the Glenn Gould Professional School.

To order Magic Breath or scores of the music, call 416-223-1717, e-mail musarch@pathcom.com or visit www.toreadorrecords.com.

Helen Medwedeff Greenberg's music has been performed throughout Canada and in the United States, Europe and Israel.

Survivor publishes her story after Spielberg interview

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Romanian Holocaust survivor Edith Elefant Sommerfeld says her memory was triggered after she was interviewed for Steven Spielberg's Shoah foundation.

Edith Sommerfeld seen in the Israeli Defence Forces' offices of the military police in 1945.

Out of that interview, conducted by the film director's Shoah Visual History Foundation, came her book Too Small to Matter, in which she recalls her life in Romania, and later in Palestine and Canada.

Sommerfeld documents her idyllic early childhood in Romania in the 1930s and the journey that brought her to Palestine, as well as the events leading to the establishment of the State of Israel.

Sommerfeld took two years to complete Too Small to Matter and it was two more years before it was published by Trafford Publishing's web bookstore, www.trafford.com.

"I wanted to show what had happened to a family during the war – not only what the Germans and Russians did, but also the Romanians," she said.

Sommerfeld was born in 1932 in Romania, part of German-speaking Bukowina in Romania.

She says that the Jews were proud of their German culture and refinement, and despite the horrific events during the Holocaust, some elderly Jewish residents in Czernowitz "are still delighted to be reminded of their cherished German heritage."

In 1941, Romania's German allies occupied Bukowina and schooling for Jewish children was prohibited.

In 1943, at the age of 11, Edith and her parents, part of a small group of academics, began their escape from Czernowitz. Their goal was to reach Palestine, which at the time was a British Mandate protectorate. In peacetime, the trip would have taken a few days by train. It took the group two torturous years.

Sommerfeld's account of their arrival in Palestine and the rebuilding of their lives reflects the many challenges and joys the pioneers faced. In 1950, she was drafted into Israel's Defence Forces and served in the offices of the military police. She also worked as a stewardess at El Al Airlines.

After a divorce, she became reacquainted with an old friend, Uri Sommerfeld. A single parent with a son, she married him in 1961.

"On our honeymoon in 1961," she says, "we came to Canada. We fell in love with the country and decided that once we retired, we would spend the rest of our life in Canada."

Sommerfeld is now writing a book about her life in Israel. Once again, she will interweave historical events with her story.

The Sommerfelds have three sons from previous marriages, two living in Israel and one in Los Angeles, and a daughter, Daniella, who lives in Toronto.

CBC TV biopic on Newman is absorbing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Midway through The Biographer's Voice: The Life & Times of Peter C. Newman, the rumpled subject of this absorbing CBC television biopic says, "I've had a very busy life."

This is surely an immense understatement, since the distinguished Canadian journalist has been extremely prolific.

As a correspondent and columnist for the Toronto Star and Maclean's magazine in Ottawa, he filed more than two million words on Canadian politics. And as an author, he has written 20 books, including Flame of Power, The Distemper of our Times, The Canadian Establishment and Company of Adventurers.

Newman hardly paused for breath as he climbed from Jewish refugee in Nazi-occupied Europe to Canadian journalistic icon. His odyssey will be broadcast on Thursday, Feb. 10, at 7 p.m.

The documentary, ably directed by Mike Sheerin and coinciding with the publication of Newman's memoir, Here Be Dragons: Telling Tales of People, Passion and Power, navigates his personal and professional lives.

Rather than unfolding in time-honoured chronological order, the film jumps around, starting with Newman's days as an outsider at Upper Canada College – a bastion of the Anglo-Saxon elite – and ending with a snapshot of himself and his fourth wife, Alvy – the love of his life – at sea on his sailboat.

What emerges is a nuanced portrait of an aloof, overweeningly ambitious, somewhat insecure man who reinvented himself in his adopted homeland.

A child of privilege, he grew up in a mansion in Breclav, a town in Czechoslovakia where his father, an industrialist, was the biggest employer. On his eighth birthday, Newman's parents gave him a swimming pool. "Anything I wanted, I got," he recalls.

But the idyll was shattered by Germany's dismemberment of Czechoslovakia. When Newman's father realized that the Czech army was powerless to protect them from Nazi anti-Semitism, he announced, "It's over for us here. We have to flee."

When Newman returns to Breclav on a sentimental visit, he can no longer identify with the place, but probably can commiserate with the American novelist, Thomas Wolfe, who once remarked, "You can't go home again."

As Sheerin retraces Newman's boyhood, Newman appears at Upper Canada College in Toronto's affluent Forest Hill neighbourhood. Newman arrived at the school on Sept. 4, 1943, some three years after he and his parents fled Europe on the last ship to leave Nazi-occupied France.

His English was faulty and he felt alone, desperate to gain the acceptance of his fellow students. But, as he acknowledges, he was not "one of them."

He did not fit into "the prevailing jock culture," Hal Jackman, a contemporary and a former lieutenant-governor of Ontario, observes.

Nevertheless, Newman yearned to be a white Anglo-Saxon Protestant. He had already embarked on that quest. Before their arrival in Canada, he and his parents were baptized as Catholics.

"We had to stop being Jews to enter Canada," says Newman in a reference to Canada's restrictive immigration policy. In effect, their baptismal certificate was their passport to Canada.

Newman's ill-conceived marriage to an Anglo-Irish girl was part of his assimilationist strategy. But the union – the first of four – collapsed, and the divorce left him virtually insolvent.

Sheerin does not say why Newman chose journalism as a profession. But he was eminently successful, vaulting to the editorship of the Toronto Star and Maclean's, which he adeptly transformed into a thriving weekly.

His second book, Renegade in Power, a best-seller, was a probing account of John Diefenbaker's prime ministership that clearly offended Diefenbaker. One of his cronies, a senator, hit back, branding Newman "a Jew boy."

Newman now considers that incident as "a slap in the face." It left him with the realization that he would "never be a WASP." What is surprising is that Newman, a shrewd and sophisticated man, could be so blinkered and naive.

The Other Zionists a critique of Israeli checkpoints

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For more than a decade now, Israel has used a system of checkpoints to control the movements of Palestinians in the West Bank.

Put into place before the eruption of the current Palestinian uprising, checkpoints, permanent or temporary, help the Israeli army deal with the scourge of terrorism, which has had a devastating effect on Israel in the past five years.

Checkpoints also tighten Israel's grip on the territories, humiliate, embitter and alienate the Palestinian population and exacerbate and perpetuate the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Eric Scott's documentary, The Other Zionists, deals broadly with two related topics: the checkpoints and the Israeli organization, Machsom Watch, that tries to blunt the inconvenience and pain they inflict on Palestinians. It was screened recently under the auspices of Yosher: Toronto Jewish Network for Social Justice, which advocates a two-state solution.

Machsom Watch, which was formed after the eruption of the second intifadah in September 2000, is composed solely of women – 400 or more – and is associated with Women in Black, an anti-occupation organization. The reason only women are recruited is that they are less likely to get into fights with the soldiers on duty at checkpoints.

Scott, a Montrealer, spent two years filming The Other Zionists, which takes a dim view of the occupation and the checkpoints, and conveys the impression that the young soldiers who man them tend to be immature and insensitive.

In part, the film revolves around Ronnee Jaeger, a Machsom Watch activist from Toronto who fervently believes that checkpoints run counter to Israel's interests in achieving a rapprochement with the Palestinians.

Scott – whose previous film turned on Esther Delisle, a Quebecois academic who incurred the wrath of her fellow Catholics by writing a book about anti-Semitism in Quebec – presents both sides of the argument on checkpoints.

He talks to Jaeger, who claims that they spawn terrorism; Gidon Levy, a Ha'aretz reporter who describes them as "the gates to a terrible prison" and the occupation as a corrupting influence on Israel; an Israeli reservist who opposes Israel's presence in the territories, and a mother who feels that her son, a soldier, was killed in vain while manning a checkpoint.

In addition, he interviews a 43-year-old Palestinian who was severely beaten by soldiers while trying to cross a checkpoint on his way to visit his wife in a hospital.

The pro-checkpoint view is represented by David Bedien, a right-wing journalist who mocks Machsom Watch; an unnamed and observant American Jewish immigrant who dismisses Machsom activists as fools; Yossi Klein Halevi, an American reporter based in Jerusalem who thinks that they're naive, and two soldiers who believe that checkpoints are absolutely necessary under the current circumstances and present evidence for their case.

There is merit in this balanced approach. But Scott, who made The Other Zionists mainly for a Diaspora audience, does not pay sufficient attention to the underlying purpose of checkpoints. Bad as they are for Israel's image and the negative impact they have on Palestinians, checkpoints are largely a response to terrorism.

He alludes to Israel's security problems only in passing, though his interview with a victim of terrorism – a teary French-born woman who wants no contact with Palestinians after being wounded in a suicide attack– is compelling.

It should be noted that The Other Zionists, though yet to be seen in Israel or broadcast on TV in English Canada, is being considered by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival for inclusion in its 2005 lineup.

Studio does brisk business through word of mouth

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Declining profits in the music industry, bruised by file-sharing and falling CD sales, leave record companies no choice but to limit how many artists they sign.

Logic dictates this means recording studios would also be teetering on the precipice – but in fact Toronto's Phase One Studios is doing brisk business while also giving Jewish artists a platform.

Barry Lubotta's Phase One Studios huddles at the edge of a strip plaza, practically hidden from sight on Kennedy Road; yet its footprint has made its mark in the North American music industry. Artists such as Sting, Herbie Hancock, Rush, Anne Murray, Jann Arden and Amy Sky have all recorded or mixed albums inside one of the four studios in the 7,500 sq. ft. facility.

Lubotta is also proud to be one of the premiere studios for Jewish musicians. A clientele list ranges from Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim to popular ensemble Zemer Orchestra to renowned singer Mordechai Ben David. Not to be forgotten, the Barenaked Ladies (whose singer Steven Page is part of the tribe) recorded four songs at Phase One.

"I like helping the Jewish community. I feel like I'm doing my part," says Lubotta, 57, who has run Phase One for the past four years. A sidekick project that also enlists Jewish artists – such as reggae artist Ron Wiseman – is Lubotta's label MarshMellow Records, which is "not a big part of the business but it's good to be vertically integrated."

What also helps is Phase One's reputation sown from the seeds of its rock' n' roll days when it first opened doors in 1973.

Known as a high-end recording studio home to Canada's most famous mastering facility, Phase One worked with Canadian talent such as Randy Bachman. But in the 1990s, Phase One fell into disrepair and owner Paul Gross was looking to sell the space. Lubotta, a Montreal native who played in a band during his university days in upstate New York, ran a popular indie music studio at the time and expressed interest in buying Phase One. In September 2000, Lubotta acquired the sprawling studio and promised himself to renovate Phase One to become "a world-class facility."

He says he brought with him a "commitment to excellence and a passion for doing things correctly."

Many of its studios were rebuilt from scratch and expanded. Studio C, which was little more than an office at the time, became a mixing room featuring a 72-input console, a ProTools HD system and a projector delivering a 62-inch picture. (One pair of speakers in Studio C retails for $40,000, to give an idea how costly a studio renovation can be.)

Studio A, the infamous space where Sting recently sang, enjoyed a redesign that brought in a Yamaha piano and an adjoining private lounge. Lubotta points out that Studio A is home to a Neve console, considered the Jaguar of recording consoles.

"Sometimes, I'll get a booking just because I have a Neve," Lubotta says.

Hearing Lubotta go on to explain the technicalities of each studio is almost dizzying but it makes one thing clear: Phase One is serious about music. And not just rock n' roll – "every type of music imaginable," Lubotta says, "from country to pop to classical."

Sometimes, Phase One will work with film actors, as it did once with Catherine Zeta-Jones for the animated film Sinbad.

Even more rare is leaving the studio to record events, but Lubotta is overjoyed he was able to record a speech by Rabbi Leonid Feldman of Florida when he came to Toronto to lecture on the March of the Living. "If I hadn't recorded that, I wouldn't have that living piece of history," Lubotta says, his eyes looking off in the distance.

He then adds, "The beauty of recordings is that you can capture a moment of time forever."

Music trends may change over time, Lubotta explains, but the art of capturing great music hasn't changed. To make a lasting piece of work, rather than "a quickie pushed out to be successful," a musician needs to put immense effort into the project. He remembers Anne Murray recording her latest album at Phase One, spending nine weeks at the facility, working daily from 10 am to 5 pm.

"To play with the big boys, you need to be in the same league," Lubotta advises, citing how home studios give the impression of an easy job but they inevitably produce inferior albums. But to make clients feel at home, Phase One offers creature comforts like LCD televisions, leather couches and a kitchen.

Walking through Phase One feels more like a peek behind the production curtain than a stroll around an expansive bungalow. As Lubotta mentions, many music lovers don't know – or understand – what goes into recording an album.

From the rubber-sealed soundproof doors to the computer monitors displaying the zig-zag colours of instrument tracks, Phase One holds an impressive array of technology designed to deliver optimum sound.

A sound engineer demonstrates the various effects sprinkling modern music by increasing the reverb on one instrument in a hip-hop tune, and then raising the volume of the soul singers in the background. What sounds effortless on a song looks meticulous in the recording studio, and Lubotta claims the "real heroes in music are the engineers and producers. They are the sound sculptors who don't get much press."

With experienced engineers and a long clientele list, Phase One "makes a reasonable profit every year," Lubotta says, despite the hefty capital investment in hi-tech equipment. Marketing costs are minimal, since 99 per cent of business comes from word-of-mouth, Lubotta notes. "If we continue like this, I'll be very pleased," he says.

It seems Lubotta is already very happy with his business, and how he spends his nine-to-five. "I feel like the luckiest guy in the world because I get to indulge my passion in music daily," he says. "It certainly beats working in a lot of other jobs."

Schindler – the man behind the myth

Oskar Schindler, The Untold Account of his Life, Wartime Activities and the True Story Behind the List* by David M. Crowe, Westview Press

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

For most people, Oskar Schindler will forever be linked with the portrayal by Liam Neeson in Steven Spielberg's award-winning 1993 film Schindler's List.

It was this movie that made Oskar Schindler a household name. Based on a book by Thomas Keneally, Schindler's List, however, did take a few liberties with the truth.

In particular, ironically, as David Crowe points out in his recently published book Oskar Schindler, The Untold Account of his Life, Wartime Activities and the True Story Behind the List, there was no "Schindler's List" per se.

Unlike Keneally's book, Crowe's book is a far more scholarly approach, delving behind the Schindler myth and into the full tragedy of the Polish Holocaust and how it affected Schindler and the group of Jews known as the Schindler Jews.

As Crowe points out, the dramatic sequence in the film in which Schindler and Itzhak Stern, a Jew chosen by Schindler to work as an accountant, type out the "Schindler's List" on a typewriter just before the liquidation of the Plaszow Camp is pure fiction.

When Plaszow's ruthless commander Amon Goth was arrested by the SS for corruption in 1944, his replacement was ordered to liquidate the camp. Schindler was determined to save its Jews from Auschwitz and managed to get permission to transfer his enamel factory Emalia to Brunnlitz in Czechoslovakia.

Because Schindler himself was preoccupied at the time fighting resistance to this move by local party figures and business interests, the task of coming up with the list of 1,000 people to work in Brunnlitz fell to Marcel Goldberg, the assistant to Franz Muller, the overseer of Jewish labour in the region.

"In reality," Crowe writes, "Schindler had absolutely nothing to do with the creation of his famous transport list… [in fact] so many longtime Emalia workers were not on it."

Goldberg was an OD man – Jewish police – in the Plaszow Camp. Several Schindler Jews were critical of him when interviewed by the author, mostly because he sold spots on the list for diamonds and other valuables that were smuggled into the camp.

"If you had no connections, money or significant ties, it was possible you could be replaced by someone who had the money to bribe Goldberg," Crowe writes. Although Schindler didn't have much of a say, Goldberg was smart enough to know that he had to put the important Schindler people on his list.

Schindler likely pointed out to Goldberg the people he knew. (Helen, Goth's housemaid, was one such person who Schindler personally intervened for.) Unlike in the film portrayal, Schindler was not on intimate terms with the majority of workers at Emalia and probably couldn't name more than a handful.

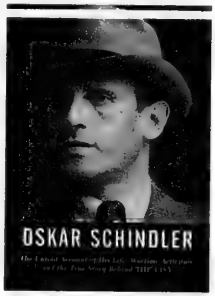
The majority of the Jews on the list were chosen especially because they had money, influence and closeness to Goldberg. As one Schindler Jew tells Crowe: "There were a lot of crooks and kapos on the list."

But Crowe points out it is wrong to imagine there was something wrong with being on the list because one was in a position of influence at Plaszow.

"For every unsavoury character… there were many, many caring Jewish 'prominents' who used their positions to help others."

Another interesting aspect of the "Schindler's List" is that there was more than one list – and each was revised several times.

There was the original men's Plaszow-Gross Rosen (an Auschwitz subcamp where the men were quarantined before their transfer to Brunnlitz) list; another list from Gross Rosen to Brunnlitz, plus two separate women's lists for the 300 women sent to Auschwitz (as dramatized in the film) and from Auschwitz to Brunnlitz.



"The problem with each of these lists is some of the Schindler men on the Plaszow-Gross Rosen list were taken off by Goldberg and replaced when [they] arrived at Gross Rosen. The same is true for the list of 300 women on the Plaszow-Auschwitz transport… the lists drawn up by Goldberg in Plaszow were different from the lists of men and women who reached Schindler's camp in the Sudetenland."

There are also other aspects of Spielberg's film and Keneally's book that Crowe says didn't happen or were highly dramatized.

For example, while the 300 women being sent to Brunnlitz were incarcerated at Auschwitz just as they were in the film, it is a myth that Schindler himself jumped to their rescue.

Schindler likely never went to Auschwitz to bribe the commandant for their release, as depicted in the film. He knew that the women, like the men, had to undergo a quarantine period before their transfer to Brunnlitz. But when they failed to show up after a few days he did get worried.

"But what really happened was quite different from the Spielberg version." Crowe claims that the basis of Spielberg's version was drawn from the Keneally book, which stated that "it was part of the 'Schindler mythology.'"

According to Stern, Schindler sent his secretary with some bribes to negotiate for the women. Ironically, Stern's mother, who contracted typhus at Auschwitz, was one of at least five women whose names were left off the Brunnlitz transfer list.

But according to Schindler's wife Emilie, Oskar sent his technical engineer from Brunnlitz with a bribe to Auschwitz. But when this didn't work, Schindler sent his friend Hilde to Auschwitz to free the women with, according to Emilie, "her great beauty."

Yet another story is told by Mietek Pemper, a Schindler Jew who said Oskar used his military connections to release them.

So which story is accurate? In all likelihood a combination of all of them, but it is most likely that Schindler never made the trip to Auschwitz. It would have been too dangerous for himself and for the 700 men left to the whims of the SS in Brunnlitz.

There are other myths and historical inaccuracies in the film – such as the little girl in the red dress Schindler sees while watching the evacuation of the Kracow ghetto – which Crowe goes to great length to disprove. But this book is not merely a criticism of the Spielberg film.

Oskar Schindler is a scholarly attempt to bring the real Schindler to life and to try to explain why Schindler did what he did.

He begins with Schindler's ties in Czechoslovakia to the Abwehr – Germany's military intelligence. Schindler was arrested by the Czech police in 1938 and described in a report as "a spy of big calibre and an especially dangerous type."

Those ties with the Abwehr, though, would become crucial later on. Without them, it is unlikely Schindler would have been able to save his Jews.

After the fall of Poland in 1939, Schindler went to Krakow to start a business and become rich. Schindler, an opportunist, hired Jewish labour only because it came cheaply. There was no altruistic motive, at least not then.

Crowe describes Schindler's relationship with Goth, the sadistic overseer of Plaszow; the Krakow Ghetto and its liquidation. A chapter is spent detailing the infrastructure of the SS and its corruption.

Crowe's book is comprehensive and gives a good account of the mechanisms of the Holocaust in Poland.

The book also details Schindler's life after the war. Schindler was never allowed to return to his Brunnlitz factory in Czechoslovakia. As a Sudeten German, he was stripped of his Czech citizenship. He immigrated to Argentina and started a fur farm, which was a financial disaster.

Back in Germany, he struggled to get adequate compensation for his wartime expenses saving the Jews and ultimately had to rely on his Schindler Jews for financial support.

Schindler's one hope for financial rescue came from a Hollywood studio. In 1964, MGM expressed interest in making a film on Schindler's life to be called To the Last Hour. A film treatment, described in the book, was made and Gregory Peck was touted to play the lead role. The financial terms were quite impressive and Schindler stood to make a large amount of money from the movie. However, MGM pulled out and the film was never made.

Throughout the book, the author tries to make sense of the enigma that was Oskar Schindler. When, he asks, did Schindler change from being a greedy factory owner to a Righteous Gentile?

Unlike the film, in which Schindler watches the liquidation of the Kracow ghetto on horseback, such a distinct moment of change never happened in real life. Schindler's change didn't happen overnight, the author believes.

Crowe says while Schindler's interest in his Jewish workers was initially good business sense (a starving, beaten worker is rather unproductive), the growing death and violence "disgusted him and prompted him to do whatever he could to protect his Jewish workers from the SS… as the Holocaust became more deadly."

A key example of Schindler's change came in the fall of 1944 when he chose to risk everything to move the factory to Brunnlitz after the liquidation of Plaszow. At that point, he could have taken his profits and escaped westward, leaving the Jews to their fate.

"At this point in his life, I think Oskar Schindler was absolutely determined to do everything he could to save as many Jews as he could regardless of the cost," Crowe writes. "During the last two years of the war, he had undergone a dramatic moral transformation, and he came more and more to associate himself with his Jews than with other Germans."

In his 700-page book, Crowe steps outside the Schindler myth, giving an objective historical analysis of Schindler's life. Oskar Schindler features groundbreaking research and took seven years to write. Crowe took advantage of the recently found Schindler documents unavailable to previous writers and to Spielberg. Anyone wishing to dig deep into the real Oskar Schindler will find this book rewarding.

White supremacist finds it hard to get web presence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A B.C. White supremacist appears to be playing a cat-and-mouse game with Internet service providers, switching from one to another in order to remain on the Web.

The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center reported last week that web host Shaw Communications had removed "exterminance.org," a site that contained neo-Nazi materials and had been trying to recruit for a skinhead group in Fort St. John, B.C., a town about 1,200 kilometres northeast of Vancouver.

But Shaw president Peter Bissonnette said exterminance.org was never hosted by the Calgary-based telecommunications company. "We wouldn't allow a site like that on Shaw," he said.

Bissonnette said Shaw personnel tracked the website to an Internet service provider in Dallas, Texas, called The Planet.

Rick Eaton, senior researcher at the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Los Angeles office, said he had found evidence that linked exterminance.org to Shaw. A search using "whois," a web tracking service, found that the registrant for exterminance.org has access to the Internet though his e-mail address "adolfhitler@shaw.ca."

"The connection to Shaw is that [the registrant] clearly has a Shaw e-mail," Eaton said.

Bissonnette told The CJN that while the customer had chosen a disturbing e-mail address, that did not necessarily mean his website was ever hosted on a Shaw computer. He said he would consult with the company's legal counsel "to see what we can do to limit use of that name.

"I don't like to see that kind of juxtaposition either," he said.

Eaton said determining web hosts is a "murky" business. "This is an inexact science. They may be moving it."

By late last week, exterminance.org appeared to be hosted by a service provider in Denver, Eaton said. However, the day before, Shaw had tracked it to the Dallas company. A month before that, the Wiesenthal Center operated on the assumption that the site was hosted by Shaw.

As The CJN went to press, the site had been removed several times and was no longer available, but Ella Petrovic, an education assistant at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto, speculated the white supremacist behind the site might succeed in again placing it on the Internet, even if the service provider denied him access.

"This kid is probably very handy with computers," she said.

The site, which was decorated with swastika flags, the "14 words" of the white supremacist movement and a violent novella by David Lane, a jailed member of The Order, was initially discovered by a supporter of the Wiesenthal Center in December.

The Friends subsequently contacted Shaw, but company spokespeople stated they had no record of the site's existence. Shaw recommended that the center contact police. A complaint was laid with the British Columbia hate crimes unit, which is investigating.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, said white supremacists generally avoid Canadian service providers, who must comply with Criminal Code provisions against promoting hate, as well as human rights legislation. Instead, they locate their Internet operations in the United States.

Eaton said The Planet at one point hosted sites from jihadist groups that aired beheading videos online. The service provider pulled them once it was informed of their content.

Web service providers can host tens of thousands of sites and are generally unaware of their content unless someone brings it to their attention, he said.

In addition, wholesalers buy space from service providers and sell it to individuals who maintain websites on the host computers. It's possible a service provider would not know who it was hosting on its computers, Eaton added.

No bluffing – poker takes hold among Jews

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Poker, a game once dominated by thugs and cheats, is finally beginning to shed its bad reputation as Jewish youth all over North America are coming together to play for fun, or for a cause.

Weekly poker nights with the boys – or girls – have become a widespread fad since the U.S. sports station ESPN began airing the World Series of Poker seven years ago.

With the game branching out from casinos to suburban basements across North America, poker is finally becoming a game even your mother could love.

"Despite the negative connotation poker receives, it has turned out to be another way for 20something Jews to spend more time together," says Oren Shefa, who has been hosting weekly poker nights for the past year in Toronto for a group of friends.

But the poker they're playing is not the traditional five-card stud of those old Hollywood westerns.

Shefa and his friends play a version called No Limit Texas Hold'em, in which the player who makes the best five-card hand with any combination of their two face-down cards and five community cards wins the round. The game emerged as early as the 18th century, but gained widespread popularity in 1970 when it became the official playing style of the World Series.

> 'Jews have a history of playing games, from the spinning of the dreidel on Chanukah to the hiding of the afikoman on Passover'

Isaac Oziel, another local poker fiend, says it's only natural that Jews have picked up the game.

"In terms of the jump in Jewish people playing poker, Jews have a history of playing games, from the spinning of the dreidel on Chanukah to the hiding of the afikoman on Passover," he says.

In fact, Jews playing poker is not a new phenomenon.

Players such as the late Stu Ungar, who some argue was the best to ever play the game, and Jay Heimowitz, who won the coveted World Series bracelet six times, dominated the game in the 1970s alongside Texas poker legends Johnny Moss and Amarillo Slim Preston. The two groups even developed a "Texans against Jews" rivalry.

Today, such ethnic and geographic divisions are not as obvious, but there is still a Jewish presence at pro tables.

Jeff Shulman and his father, Card Player Magazine publisher Barry Shulman, are both professional players, and Russell Rosenblum, a real estate attorney, is good enough to have finished fifth in the 2002 World Series.

The game has become such a phenomenon that people are coming up with any excuse to play, including fundraising.

Last November, a chapter of the Jewish fraternity AEPi at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Va., helped organize a Texas Hold'em tournament to raise money for the Winnipeg Centre for Ethiopian Jews in Be'er Sheva and the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation.

Yet, despite the good intentions of the fraternity and prominent professional players such as Barry Greenstein – known as the "Robin Hood of Poker," because he donates all his winnings to charity – there is an ongoing debate about whether playing poker is permissible under Jewish law.

While gambling for a cause is frowned upon, gambling itself is not against halachah, provided it's done for fun and not to make a living.

But although it's not strictly forbidden, it is discouraged by rabbis, including Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz of Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

In his "Reb on the Web" column, Schwartz wrote that many rabbis permit occasional gambling on holidays such as Purim and Chanukah, but the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) passed a resolution in 1979 that said the Reform body "deplores the use of gambling devices to raise funds for Jewish religious and communal institutions as being contrary to our faith and tradition."

Regardless of the reasons people play, poker is bringing young Jews together.

"I play poker with my Jewish friends because it's a way for me to see all my synagogue buddies at least once a week," says Moshe Hadida, who plays with Oziel on a regular basis.

"We all have different things in our life, like school, work, girlfriends… When we play poker on Sunday nights, it's our way to catch up with each other."

Smashnova fails to advance in Australia

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Anna Smashnova's run at the Australian Open was brought to an abrupt end by former world number one Venus Williams last week. Williams powered into the fourth round of the tournament with a 6-3, 6-0 victory over the 27th seeded Smashnova.

The eighth-seeded American romped through the contest in exactly an hour, despite making 26 unforced errors.

Looking for her first grand slam title since 2001, Williams began by dropping her serve but with her ground strokes working well, broke back in the fourth game on her way to taking the opening set.

She then stepped up a gear in the second and Smashnova, an Israeli who has never been beyond the third round at Melbourne Park, had no answer.

Anna Smashnova

"For me it's all about consistency and errors. The less errors I make, the tougher it is for my opponent," Williams said.

The result left men's doubles pair Andy Ram and Yonni Erlich as the only remaining Israeli representatives at the competition, after Tzipi Obziler's run was ended by Anna Myskina.

The Israeli pair advanced to the third round without playing after Jarko Nieminen of Finland, who plays with Hyung Taik Lee of Korea, retired with an injury.

Ram and Erlich were knocked out in the third round after a three-set battle, 6-1, 4-6, 7-6 (10-8) with brothers Bob and Mike Bryan of the United States. Both players were in action soon afterward in the mixed doubles. Ram teamed up with Conchita Martinez of Spain to beat Sebastian Prieto and Giselo Dulko of Argentina 5-7, 7-5, 7-6. Erlich and Tiantian Sun of China lost 6-3, 7-6 to Rick Leach of the United States and Virginia Pascual of Spain.

While New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft was in Pittsburgh rooting on his team to a 41-27 win over the Pittsburgh Steelers in the AFC championship game, his wife, Myra, held a party at the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem, where dozens watched the game on a big screen TV. Myra Kraft, who was in Israel with a delegation of young leaders from Boston's Jewish federation, was held up in Israel because of heavy snowstorms that covered the northeast of the United States and was unable to get to the game. The Krafts are the patrons of the American Football in Israel league, and paid for the building of the league's stadium in Jerusalem, which is named Kraft Field.

A day of bravery

Bravery: courage, boldness, heroism. Bravery is also the quality of spirit that enables you to face danger or pain without showing fear.

I recently witnessed four acts of bravery on the same day.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

1 p.m. – On the street walking towards the subway: I saw a friend who was recently released from a detoxification centre for alcoholism. He was living on the street for more than two years and is now actively working to change his life. He is looking for a job and recently moved into a room of his own. He had stopped drinking for 50 days straight.

He looked me in the eyes with a fierce determination and said, "I slipped up on New Year's and had a drink. But I am not giving up, I am back on track now and I am going to Alcoholics Anonymous twice a day. I am also going back to detoxification and I will try again."

I am extremely proud of him. He is an inspiration to everyone who has ever struggled with addiction – on or off the street. The challenges he faces on a daily basis are beyond anything I can comprehend.

3 p.m. – The Don Jail: This was my first time in a jail except when I was on vacation and toured the abandoned Alcatraz in San Francisco. I got off the streetcar and walked up to the cold gray and black building. Inside, the guard instructed me to take a number and wait. So I waited – for two hours – until my number was called. I waited with the other visitors and I was overwhelmed by the images before me.

In the crowd of 30 people, five young women with babies were waiting to visit someone. One girl barely looked 18 years old and had to change her newborn baby's diaper right on the bench. She did it with a smile.

These women have their own stories and situations with one thing in common. They are not giving up despite their circumstances, challenges and perhaps their fear. It appeared some, if not all, of them were bravely raising their babies on their own. The life of a single mother is not easy, but these women have found an inner strength that helps them continue.

5 p.m. – The Hospital for Sick Children: I have been a volunteer at the hospital for four years. My experiences have been both heartwarming and devastating. Unfortunately I have witnessed situations no child should ever have to go through. But despite their unlucky circumstances, these kids are fighting. They are heroes. They courageously struggle to stay alive when they should be playing with toys and laughing with other kids. These pint-sized warriors are some of the bravest people I have ever met.

8 p.m. – Finally at home: I received a phone call telling me a man I know had just passed away. A month earlier, I had handed him a significant cash prize for winning the writing contest for the homeless that I co-ordinated through Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

His winning entry about his life struggles, family and miracles was beautifully written and inspirational. It was very difficult for him to write about his personal life experiences, but with encouragement, he empowered himself, faced his fears and made his voice heard.

I remember how he grinned proudly like a little boy when I handed him his prize and gave him a huge hug. For the last three weeks of his life, he rented an apartment with his winning money. His bravery allowed his story to live on forever.

It takes a brave person to overcome alcoholism, to raise a child alone, to battle illness or to make his or her voice heard. I admire all of these people and applaud their efforts to face the danger of pain without showing fear.

All four situations affected my life and touched my soul. I wonder what tomorrow will bring.

CARAMELIZED BANANAS W/RUM SAUCE

2 tsp. unsalted butter
1 banana, halved lengthwise, then crosswise
2 tsps. packed brown sugar
2 tblsps. dark rum
2 tsp. water
1/8 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
1/8 tsp. cinnamon
2 tblsps. sliced or chopped nuts, toasted

Accompaniment: vanilla ice cream

Melt butter in heavy skillet over moderately high heat until foam subsides, then sauté banana, cut sides down, shaking skillet, 1 minute. Remove skillet from heat and sprinkle brown sugar around banana, then pour rum around banana. Return skillet to heat and continue to sauté, shaking skillet occasionally, until sugar begins to melt, about 30 seconds.

Add water, nutmeg, cinnamon, and a pinch of salt and cook over moderate heat, shaking skillet occasionally, until sauce is slightly thickened, 1 to 2 minutes.

Serve banana hot, sprinkled with nuts.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Rosalind Franklin, (1920-1958) provided the X-ray data vital to the discovery in 1953 of the double helical structure of DNA, labelled "the most important discovery in 20th-century biology," but she was not even mentioned in the citation for the 1962 Nobel Prize.

James Watson and Francis Crick shared the Nobel Prize that recognized the importance of the discovery, but it was Franklin's preparatory work with X-ray photography that led to the discovery.

Watson, writing about the discovery in his 1968 book The Double Helix, referred, patronizingly, to his colleague only as "Rosy" and stated, arrogantly, "the best home for a feminist is in another person's lab."

Two books were written in the early 21st century telling Franklin's side of the story – Rosalind Franklin and DNA by Anne Sayre, and Rosalind Franklin: The Dark Lady of DNA.

Rosalind Franklin attended Cambridge where she earned a PhD in physical chemistry despite the fact that the university was not granting women undergraduate degrees. At that time, only men were permitted in the university dining rooms!

Rosalind Franklin

She undertook research in Paris and at Birkbeck College in London, but in between, she spent two years in the biophysics unit at King's College London. Franklin theorized that DNA existed in two distinct forms, A and B, and then proved it with clear X-ray photos.

J.D. Bernal, a physics professor at Birkbeck, described her work in these words: "The most beautiful X-ray photographs of any substances ever taken."

Her "photograph 51," which became famous, clearly showed the structure of DNA. Why was Franklin denied her proper share of recognition? It likely stemmed primarily from male prejudice. Anti-Semitism may have also played a part.

She died of cancer at age 37 – four years before the Nobel Prize was announced for the discovery of the double helix model of DNA.

This is an excerpt from The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World, researched and written by Joe King. In the book, King highlights the contributions of Jewish people in many different fields.

Joe King is a veteran Montreal writer and publicist.

Israel-Diaspora exchanges

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The Diaspora-Israel relationship has been based mostly on fundraising. Vast amounts of tzedakah have been donated to Israel by international Jewry, especially during times of war and mass immigration. This process has enabled Diaspora Jews to help secure and build the State of Israel, albeit as junior partners.

URBAN WRITER

Israeli taxpayers have benefited from Diaspora tzedakah. The money has alleviated some of their financial stress in absorbing newcomers, feeding undernourished children, helping victims of terrorism and maintaining expensive social service programs.

The times, however, are a-changin'. Tzedakah is vital to our relationship with Israel, but an additional partnering option has presented itself to the children of Israel. We can invest by exchanging creativity and know-how in areas such as education, technology, agriculture and humanitarian and relief work.

Israelis are curious folk, frequently exhibiting great brilliance through their design, discoveries, strategic thinking, academia and education. Numerous examples of this are listed in Israel In the World (Weidenfeld & Nicolson), a book compiled by Helen Davis and Douglas Davis with a forward by international philanthropist, Rupert Murdoch.

In it, Murdoch writes: "With such a wealth of creativity, I fully expect Israel to remain at the forefront of technological development… this book is a testimonial to the Israelis' incredible originality, dynamism and entrepreneurship."

I was encouraged by Murdoch's words and strengthened in my belief that a shift in Diaspora-Israel relations, focusing more on mutual goals through growth, would put Jews everywhere on an even footing, rather than maintaining the somewhat lopsided perception of Israel as the taker and Diaspora as the giver.

Israeli curiosity and Diaspora resourcefulness would be a fine recipe for powerful Jewish harmony. Israel In the World lists dozens of options to take us there, including:

- a study by Dr. Michal Shwartz of the Weizmann Institute of Science, showing that the body's own immune system can treat debilitating disorders of the central nervous system, and possibly repair damaged spinal chords if treatment is carried out within 14 days after the damage is done;
- the invention by Given Imaging Ltd. in the town of Yokne'am of a miniature disposable video camera that is swallowed by a patient and transmits 50,000 real-time images to the attending physician. The M2A Capsule Endoscope replaces invasive and uncomfortable procedures that often causes great pain to the patient;
- the development by Dr. Benjamin Bartoov of Bar Ilan University of a procedure that magnifies sperm by a factor of 6,000, compared to previous magnification of up to 400, thereby discovering the sperm with the greatest potential for inducing a successful pregnancy through in-vitro fertilization;

Other examples are: Researchers at the Soroka Medical Centre in Be'er Sheva that have shown a red tomato can deter heart disease; a creation by M-systems of Kfar Saba, called the DiskOnKey, a miniature silicon chip in the form of a small key-ring that stores huge amounts of data, including music, pictures and Powerpoint presentations; Netafim, a kibbutz co-op that pioneered drip irrigation, a watering procedure that is helping grow bananas in the Ivory Coast, sugar cane in Mauritius, melons in Mexico, vegetables in India and grapes in Germany.

Diaspora-Israel relations will and should always include the exchange of tzedakah (interestingly, Israel now funds some Diaspora programs). Our relationship can be enhanced, however, when Jews in and out of Israel build an organic partnership sharing our grandest resource – the Jewish mind, our curiosity, our ability and our yearning to invent, grow and repair the world.

40 years of German – Israeli friendship

German President Horst Koehler pledged his country would support Israel forever. "Ties between Israel and Germany today are strong and full of friendship," Koehler said at the outset of a two-day visit to Jerusalem last week marking 40 years of formal relations between the two countries. During his visit, Koehler visited Yad Vashem and addressed the members of the Knesset. Koehler was moved by his visit to Yad Vashem, as is apparent from the tears visible in his eyes, above right.

CIA agrees to disclose postwar links to Nazis

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The CIA, under pressure from the U.S. Congress, has agreed in principle to release new documents detailing its ties to former Nazis who helped with U.S. Cold War espionage against the Soviet Union, officials said last week.

Facing demands for public testimony before the U.S. Senate judiciary committee, CIA officials have conceded that records on former Nazis who have not been accused of war crimes, including members of the German SS, should be subject to the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act of 1998, the officials said.

"This means the information we thought would come out when we wrote the law, will now come out," said Senator Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican who co-authored the disclosure legislation.

The CIA, which had no immediate comment, has released some 1¼ million pages of documents about Nazi war criminals, in compliance with the disclosure act, which requires government agencies to divulge records of war criminals to the Nazi War Crimes and Japanese Imperial Government Records Interagency Working Group.

But until now, the CIA has refused to disclose documents on ex-Nazis who have not been accused as war criminals. Members of the working group and American lawmakers say the law applies to any individual who belonged to an organization guilty of war crimes.

The records at issue include hundreds of thousands of pages of documents, including material on CIA dealings with former members of the Nazi party and the German SS who joined the allied Cold War effort against the Soviet Union, congressional officials said.

The CIA's position changed late last week in closed-door discussions with working group members after DeWine, who sits on the Senate judiciary committee, demanded that CIA director Porter Goss appear before the panel to provide a public explanation of his agency's refusal to disclose the records.

It was not clear whether DeWine would cancel the judiciary committee hearing, tentatively set for Feb. 15. A CIA spokesperson said the agency was prepared to demonstrate flexibility.

The News in Brief

Canada

New Ryerson Prez

TORONTO — Sheldon Levy will be the new president of Ryerson University for a five-year term beginning Aug. 1, the school announced. Currently vice-president of finance and strategy at the University of Ontario Institute of Technology in Oshawa, Levy has also served as a vice-president of the University of Toronto, president of Toronto's Sheridan College and as a vice-president at York University. He succeeds Claude Lajeunesse, Ryerson's president for the past 10 years.

Comment Denounced

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress strongly denounced comments last week by a veterinarian that Ontario's proposed pit-bull ban is "eerily reminiscent of fascism and the final solution." Mary Yett of the Beaver Creek Animal Hospital told a legislative committee holding hearings in Brantford, Ont., on the ban that classifying all dogs with a similar appearance as dangerous is "analogous to racism." Yett later apologized for making an "entirely inappropriate" analogy. "My partner is Jewish and I would never want to offend anyone. What I was comparing was a political technique and I admit I used harsh language," she told the Toronto Star.

Taylor Hearing Off

TORONTO — A U.S. judge says he will settle an ownership dispute over a Van Gogh painting between actress Elizabeth Taylor and the family of Hamilton, Ont., lawyer Andrew Orkin based on written arguments alone. Judge Gary Klausner, a U.S. District Court judge in California, made the move as he cancelled a hearing on the matter slated for last week. Taylor wants him to dismiss Orkin's claim that his German-Jewish grandmother was forced to give up the 1889 painting View of the Asylum and Chapel at Saint-Remy when she fled Nazi persecution in the 1930s. Orkin wants the judge to throw out Taylor's bid to have her declared the rightful owner of the painting. She claims it legitimately changed hands after the war and that she bought it in good faith in 1963.

World

Nazis Clean Up Road

PORTLAND — Despite an uproar, officials in Oregon's rural Marion County say they can't stop the American Nazi Party from taking part in a road-cleaning program that puts the party's name on a roadside sign. The U.S. Supreme Court recently refused to hear a challenge to the Ku Klux Klan adopting a stretch of road in Missouri.

Lawsuit Threatened

NEW YORK — A Jewish group has threatened to sue the Vatican if it doesn't release information about Jewish children hidden in convents during World War II who may never have been returned to Jewish communities. In Jan. 27 news conferences in New York and in Washington, D.C., the group Coalition for Jewish Concerns-Amcha said it would sue if the Vatican didn't release its records within a week. The move came after the recent discovery of a Vatican letter to French authorities asking them not to return Jewish children who were hidden and baptized to their parents or Jewish communities. The Anti-Defamation League is circulating a petition urging the Vatican to release its war-era baptismal records.

Jews Head to Spain

MADRID — Argentine Jewish immigration is boosting the numbers of Spain's Jewish community. Federico Zukierman, vice-president of Madrid's Hebraica Jewish community centre, said some 10,000 Argentine Jews arrived in Spain in 2004. "In 2004 there have arrived more Jews to Spain than in the last 10 years," and most are 20 to 30 years old, Zukierman said.

Conference Postponed

NEW YORK — A Columbia University conference on the Middle East slated for last week was postponed after Israel's U.S. Ambassador Danny Ayalon refused to appear due to controversy over charges that faculty are intimidating pro-Israel students. Columbia has assembled a panel to probe the charges. Jewish groups and Israeli officials asked the school to postpone the meeting until after the panel issues a report this month. Conference co-ordinator and ex-U.S. senator George Mitchell said he put off the event because some Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. officials who agreed to take part said they could not because of commitments in the Mideast.

Burial in Israel

KABUL — The next-to-last Afghan Jew will be buried in Israel. Yitzhak Levi's remains were sent to Uzbekistan last week, the first stop on a journey to Israel. Levi, 80, died from complications related to diabetes in Kabul last month. Zevulun Simantov, 45, is the last Jew still in the country.

Kodak Buys Canadian-Israeli Firm

TEL AVIV — Photography giant Eastman Kodak announced last week it would pay $980 million (US) cash for the Canadian-Israeli digital printing company Creo.

Creo's 1,000 Israeli employees, many of whom were around when its operations were sold by Israel's Scitex Corporation to Creo in 2000, were told that until the deal closes, there will be no changes at the firm and no layoffs, but they received no promises for the future.

No one at Creo expects mass dismissals, and a 2006 move to new Israeli facilities is still on track. Creo Israel president Michael Rolant said Creo will likely be merged into Kodak's graphic media division as a single entity.

Creo was founded in Canada in 1992 by former Israeli Dan Gelbart. It makes hardware and software for the pre-printing and digital printing industries. Kodak was mainly interested in Creo's digital media and software divisions, but Creo wanted to sell the entire company. Creo had revenues of $635.8 million (US) in 2004, half from its Israeli operations. Both firms' boards have approved the deal.

Jewish students kept tabs on anti-Israel event

Protesters march past Convocation Hall at the University of Toronto last Friday as part of the Arab Student Collective's "Israeli Apartheid Week."
[Frances Kraft photo]

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at the University of Toronto devoted significant time last week to monitoring "Israeli Apartheid Week", a series of lectures and events organized by the school's Arab Student Collective, while also attending IsraelFEST, Hillel's annual week-long event celebrating Israel.

But the Arab group's controversial "anti-corporate action rally" on Friday – which was moved from just outside Hillel's Wolfond Centre to the heart of the downtown campus outside Convocation Hall – brought out only two Jewish student monitors. They left when it became apparent there were only about 20 protesters.

The small group of Arab students and their supporters marched past the Wolfond Centre, without incident, to protest elsewhere. They said they were protesting the "corporatization of our city and of campus," and they carried signs with slogans such as "Zionism = Racism," "JNF Out of Canada," "Israeli Death Forces" and "The Wall Will Fall."

A contingent of police officers was outside Convocation Hall, and at least one was stationed at the Wolfond Centre, where Tilly Shames, Hillel's Israel affairs director, said the rally showed "that there's a very small number of activists who have achieved a very loud voice."

She said she was "very proud" of Hillel students "for maintaining their focus on IsraelFEST and keeping it cultural. I think it's just unfortunate that some of our positive events that were so successful were overshadowed by anti-Israel events, but the students who were exposed to IsraelFEST came out feeling a sense of Jewish pride and pride in Israel."

She added that tensions did rise during the week, and that there were "a very small number" of Jewish students who spoke "angrily and provocatively" at some of the Israeli Apartheid Week lectures. Others asked their questions in a calm manner, she reported.

McBride trial set for this week

The trial of Christopher Steven McBride, the man charged with the July 2002 stabbing of David Rosenzweig was expected to proceed this week.

Rosenzweig, 49, was standing on Bathurst Street, south of Lawrence Avenue, when he was stabbed in the back. He had answered a call from his son, who was having car trouble, and the two were waiting for a tow truck when Rosenzweig was attacked in an apparently random fashion.

The incident provoked anger and concern in the Jewish community.

It took police less than two days to track down McBride, who was 20 at the time, and his Guyanese-born girlfriend. They were arrested by a police tactical squad in an apartment a few kilometres from the scene of the murder.

Plaudits to campus youth

From the editor's desk

Each year for more than 20 years, the Jewish students of Hillel on Toronto campuses have organized a week-long tribute to Israel known as IsraelFEST. The annual event is a celebration of Israeli art, culture and diversity. The program is marked by music, culinary displays, art exhibits and, in general, a sense of social conviviality.

It came as no surprise, therefore, that the hard-core opponents of Israel on campus and their off-campus confederates chose the very same week as Hillel's IsraelFEST 2005 – last week – to stage Israeli Apartheid Week.

Organized by the Arab Students' Collective (ASC) at the University of Toronto, the aim of this week-long diatribe against the Jewish state was as transparent as it was spurious.

It leaped with a clumsy thud, without nuance or subtlety, from the very title of their program: Israeli Apartheid week. It was yet another in-your-face rant against Israel by the same cadre of loud campus activists who fall within the category of anti-Israel spear-carriers described by McGill sociologist Morton Weinfeld in his essay The Changing Dimensions of Contemporary Canadian Anti-Semitism, recently published in Contemporary Anti-semitism: Canada and the World, University of Toronto Press, "left-liberal hard-line critics of Israeli policies [who] find themselves in bed with knee-jerk and reflexive demonizers of Israel, who include some of the most unsavoury, undemocratic, violent, dictatorial, misogynist, homophobic and generally illiberal regimes and groups anywhere."

The rant was not new. Indeed, it is and has been the mantra of anti-Israel propagandists ever since Yasser Arafat was welcomed to the rostrum of the United Nations General Assembly some three decades ago.

Their obvious aim is to cast Israel as a racist, apartheid state, the present incarnation of the only other racist, apartheid state to have ever existed – South Africa – and thus deserving of the same international condemnation, isolation and political reconfiguration that transformed South Africa. But the characterization of Israel as apartheid is invidious and utterly false. It is totally devoid of truth. Anyone who has ever spent 10 minutes, let alone 10 hours or 10 days, in Israel will know the comparison to be false.

Renowned feminist, social activist, political thinker and much-published author, professor emerita Phyllis Chesler, in her book The New Anti-Semitism, Jossey-Bass publishers, 2003, responds to the apartheid slander thus:

"If Israel is a racist, apartheid country, why did it launch Operation Solomon in 1991 to airlift 14,200 black African Jews from Ethiopia within a 24-hour period?"

And, of course, many more thousands of Jews of Ethiopia have arrived in Israel since 1991.

But even if the apartheid calumny was intended – as it was – not literally with regard to matters of race, but indirectly in relation to the Palestinians, it is still utterly devoid of truth. The evolving political separation between Israelis and Palestinians was brought about by the onslaught of Palestinian terrorism. Moreover, the separation of two peoples into two independent respective polities, is not the legalized, institutionalized separation of two peoples within one polity (apartheid).

If the slander was invoked in relation to the living conditions of the Arab Israelis, the vocal anti-establishment participation of elected Arab Israeli members of Knesset refutes this lie as well.

The social and economic disparities between Muslim and Jewish Israelis are primarily a result of the Arab world's existential war against Israel. And even here, as Chesler also notes, "in many respects (infant mortality, employment, education, religious and intellectual freedom, and freedom from torture), Israel Arab Muslim and Christian citizens fare far better in Israel than do their Arab counterparts in Islamic Arab countries."

The apartheid accusation against Israel, therefore, is a hoax and a fraud. Its utility however is unrelated to its connection to truth and reality. Its utility, like the utility of all such "big lies," is in its constant repetition. There is only one way to deal with the "big lie" and that is to fight it. The big lie must be exposed.

And that is precisely what the Jewish students on campus did last week. And for this they are to be commended. To be sure, there were differing approaches among the various Jewish student organizations to fighting the big apartheid lie. But fight they did. They responded to the apartheid provocation with clear-eyed purpose and dignified resolve and in the process, they retained credibility with other campus organizations of goodwill.

IsraelFEST itself was an eloquent refutation of the apartheid lie. It was a display of Israeli images that were diametrically at odds with the images of Israel as an apartheid state. The students cast Israel in its truer light as a multi-ethnic, multi-cultural, multi-racial, democratic, though imperfect society. Indeed, the opening of the festival with the Israeli Ethiopian musical group Idan Raichel belied the apartheid slander.

People of goodwill, who genuinely want to know the truth about the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, will also know immediately that they cannot find it among those who degrade and deceive. And that is what the apartheid labelling of Israel is: a degradation of truth and a deception directed at the public.

Vaughan mayor to lead delegation to Poland

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Michael Di Biase, the mayor of the City of Vaughan, will lead a delegation of municipal leaders to Poland in May.

The trip, which hopes to attract 40 mayors, councillors and other municipal representatives, will commemorate the 60th anniversary of VE-Day – the end of World War II in Europe – and the liberation of prisoners from Nazi concentration and death camps.

"I'm very honoured," said Di Biase. "I think the only way we can stop atrocities is by going back, finding out, understanding, learning and talking about it with other people throughout the world, and working towards a better world and a better understanding of minds."

Delegates will be in Poland at the same time as students participating in the March of the Living. On May 5, Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day), the municipal leaders will participate in the program's traditional three-kilometre march from Auschwitz to the Birkenau camp, which is considered to be the focal point of the trip. This year, March of the Living officials predict there will be 18,000 participants from around the world, the largest delegation in the history of the program.

The municipal delegates will visit the cities of Warsaw and Krakow, as well as Oskar Schindler's factory (from the film Schindler's List) and the concentration camp Majdanek. Di Biase said they will also meet with the mayors of Warsaw and Krakow to discuss building stronger business links between the Polish and the Canadian cities.

Michael Di Biase

Di Biase said he hopes the trip will help municipal leaders become stronger in the fight against discrimination of all kinds.

"We are leaders in our own cities. We are there to express our opinions. The only way we can formulate these opinions is by seeing and having a hands-on approach to these issues, rather than reading about them in books and newspapers. When you go on this kind of trip, you become a witness to what happened 60 years ago."

Di Biase was asked by UIA Federations Canada and the March of the Living to lead the trip because of his commitment to the Jewish community and to the fight against discrimination, said Michael Soberman, national director of Canada-Israel Experience, which is a partner of March of the Living.

"Mayor Di Biase has shown a very strong commitment, not only to Israel, but to stamping out anti-Semitism in his region," Soberman said. "His constituency represents one of the up-and-coming Jewish communities. It is equally important to all of his constituents to show that their mayor is committed to tolerance."

The trip for municipal delegates follows a similar trip in 2003 where Canadian municipal officials were invited through Canada-Israel Experience to visit Israel, including Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial there. Di Biase attended that trip. Soberman said trips like these not only raise awareness but help to create educators out of leaders.

"The expectation is that they come back having been exposed to a very unique and powerful experience – one that will increase not only their sensitivity surrounding the Holocaust but also to discrimination across the board," he said. "The Holocaust is an excellent example of what happens when discrimination is taken to extremes. We educate people in a variety of different forms and the more educated people we have, the more these forms become places of education."

Di Biase said he hopes that upon his return, he can share his experiences with the Jewish community of Vaughan, as well as with the rest of his constituents.

If not now, when?

The images of the sombre ceremony of remembrance last month under the snowy, gray skies of Auschwitz-Birkenau were heartening. Representatives of some 40 countries had come together on the spot where, 60 years earlier, the largest inferno of death and destruction ever devised by man was forever shut down. By their presence at the remembrance ceremony, and some by their eloquent words as well, the leaders of the countries in attendance resolved that such evil as was perpetrated within the barbed-wire precincts of that inferno would never be seen again.

Two days before the ceremony in Poland, indeed, during the same week in which the United Nations General Assembly held a special, though poorly attended, commemoration of the Shoah, the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur, which had been established pursuant to a security council resolution passed Sept. 18, 2004, filed its report. The result can only be described as surrealistic and eerie.

The commission found and reported corroborated acts of the most hideously egregious. It even identified the perpetrators.

"Based on a thorough analysis of the information gathered in the course of its investigations, the commission established that the government of the Sudan and the Janjaweed are responsible for serious violations of international human rights and humanitarian law amounting to crimes under international law. In particular, the commission found that government forces and militias conducted indiscriminate attacks, including killing of civilians, torture, enforced disappearances, destruction of villages, rape and other forms of sexual violence, pillaging and forced displacement, throughout Darfur. These acts were conducted on a widespread and systematic basis, and therefore may amount to crimes against humanity… It is clear from the commission's findings that most attacks were deliberately and indiscriminately directed against civilians."

Despite the horror of the acts they chronicled, the commission concluded that the government of the Sudan has not pursued a policy of genocide because "the crucial element of genocidal intent appears to be missing…" Their reasoning was clearly stated, if not clearly thought out. "Generally speaking the policy of attacking, killing and forcibly displacing members of some tribes does not evince a specific intent to annihilate, in whole or in part, a group distinguished on racial, ethnic, national or religious grounds."

But they seemed to feel a pang of conscience over their findings, nevertheless and offered this pleading summation. "The conclusion that no genocidal policy has been pursued and implemented in Darfur by the government authorities, directly or through the militias under their control, should not be taken in any way as detracting from the gravity of the crimes perpetrated in that region. International offences such as the crimes against humanity and war crimes that have been committed in Darfur may be no less serious and heinous than genocide."

If the civilized world does not act now, immediately, decisively, to end the non-genocidal "crimes against humanity and war crimes" in Darfur, when will it? And who will there then be left in Darfur to save?

More on Gerber

I read the opinion of Jean M. Gerber, titled "Messianic settlers put all of Israel at risk" (CJN, Jan. 20), and my mouth almost fell out of its jaw.

She claims that the settlers are an irresponsible group of people who egocentrically put the entire land of Israel in terrible danger and that their settling of their homeland is "a bad, destructive idea." Is she claiming that the commandment rooted in the Torah that says, "And you shall capture the land and settle it," is "a bad, destructive idea?"

She writes that "settler reserve army officers and their rabbinic mentors call for a refusal to obey orders to remove Gaza settlements." The chief rabbi of the settlement of Efrat said that while he opposes disengagement, a soldier must obey orders. The rosh yeshiva of the Har-Etzion Yeshiva in Gush Etzion also signed that proclamation.

Gerber writes that "settlers curse and attack Palestinian children." Maybe an example would prove this terrible accusation. She also writes that settlers are involved in attacks "on Palestinians and their olive groves," again a claim without any proof.

My biggest concern is Gerber's total dissociation with her nation, calling those living beyond the Green Line – Israel's border before the Six Day War – "the settlers" and some other group "us."

All of "them" are subject to full Israeli rights and obligations, from taxes to army service, and as such, I don't believe that any Canadian Jew has any right to decide to excommunicate them from the Jewish community.

Response to letters about Gerber: I

Whether it is Palestinians, Armenians, Jews or Irish, people in a diaspora are far more likely to take hard-line approaches to a situation rather than conciliatory ones (Letters, CJN, Feb. 3), as they do not have to live with the consequences of ongoing violence. It is not surprising that the no-compromise camp is overrepresented in what I like to call Hevronto.

Response II

Jacob Peretz wrote that "Jean M. Gerber displays a complete lack of understanding of the Arab-Israeli conflict." Peretz displayed his own lack of understanding when he wrote about the beliefs of "the Arabs." He attempts to define the beliefs of "the Arabs" as simply being against a two-state solution.

It is unfortunate that anyone would think it useful, or factual, to state that all of "the Arabs" think one thing or another.

"The Arabs," just like us Jews, are human beings with a wide array of opinions and beliefs.

Israeli breast care centres

It was with dismay and grave concern that I read Erin Silver's article "Israeli founds breast cancer centre after daughter's death" (CJN, Jan. 13) in which Joel Feldschuh alleges that no comprehensive breast cancer centre exists in Israel. While it is very commendable that he is helping fund the establishment of a breast care centre at the Sheba Medical Centre in Ramat Gan, I must note the fact that he is well aware of the existence of the Canadian Hadassah-WIZO M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute at the Assaf Harofeh Medical Centre in Zerifin.

This institute was opened in May 2000. In its first year of operation, it served 5,300 patients. In 2003, more than 12,000 patients were screened and between 250 and 300 new patients were diagnosed with breast cancer.

Within 24 to 48 hours after a patient's first visit to the institute, she is provided with a diagnosis and follow-up plan. Headed by Dr. Tami Karni and Dr. Yitzik Papo, the institute features the in-house services of a team of surgeons, oncologists, nurses, plastic surgeons, radiologists and social workers, and it offers a multi-disciplinary haven not only for cancer patients but for their families as well.

Karni welcomes the addition of as many facilities of this kind as possible in Israel. That's why she spent many hours with Dr. Moshe Papa, head of Surgery C at the Sheba Medical Centre, and Feldschuh explaining the concept behind the institute.

The raison d'être of the M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute is early detection and proper diagnosis. The institute has the most up-to-date equipment, including a mammotome, which performs minimally invasive safe and accurate breast biopsies. There are only seven such machines in Israel.

The martyr who wasn't

By JACK CHIVO

When I first read about the killing of the young Palestinian "martyr," Mohammed al Durra, in the fall of 2000, I instinctively had my doubts about the guilt of the Israeli soldiers, even though there seemed to be filmed material of the incident. I know now that even my initial caution and disbelief, based on what I had learned over the years about the falsehoods used by Arab propagandists and their soul-mates, some of them Jewish, would prove to be mild compared to the ugly face of reality.

I also have to admit that I was naive when I wrote in a story last year that the much-touted tale of the Palestinian boy's killing at the Netzarim junction in Gaza was probably the result of "friendly fire," and the culprits were apparently some of the Palestinian gunmen who were shooting at an Israeli position some 200 yards away, during the first days of intifadah.

As proof, I used the conclusions of several commissions of inquiry, along with a 2002 report shown by the German State Television, ARD, and a thoroughly documented piece in the Atlantic Monthly, where the specialists were unanimous in finding that there was little chance that the boy was killed by IDF soldiers, based on ballistic and topographic measurements.

What made the investigation infinitely more difficult was the fact that the family of the victim refused to co-operate, and no autopsy was ever conducted. Moreover, even the place of the shooting was altered the next day by the Palestinians. The bullets extracted from the wall and the concrete barrel allegedly used for protection by Mohammed and his father were removed and taken to an undisclosed location, never to be seen again.

To add to the problems faced by the independent investigators, the journalists involved – the Palestinian cameraman, Talal Hassan Abu Rahma, and the French correspondent, Charles Enderlin, from the state-owned France 2 network, who was not even there but spread the story around the world nevertheless – steadfastly declined to release more than two minutes of the alleged 27 minutes of taped material. Yet, it was claimed that Abu Rahma had given a detailed sworn testimony to a lawyer on Oct. 3, 2000, in which he declared, under oath, that he had witnessed and filmed the 45-minute shooting incident during which, he said, al Durra was killed by Israeli soldiers on Sept. 30, 2000.

> 'While many other photographers and journalists were at that spot on that particular day, no one else filmed that particular incident'

We surely remember how, afterwards, the young Palestinian "martyr" became the poster boy of the "progressive forces" around the world and was eulogized at the World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, as a symbol of the unyielding resistance against the "Zionist occupation." Poems were written about his short but heroic life, while in the Arab world, streets, schools or city squares were named after him. The Iranian Ministry of Education has even dedicated an entire website, in English and Farsi, to the memory of Mohammed al Durra.

In the past few months, however, new revelations have emerged leading to the conclusion that, not only was the young man not harmed by the Israelis, but everything related to the alleged killing might have been a cruel and elaborate hoax, similar to the one filmed by an Israeli aerial drone a year ago. In that incident, a fake Palestinian funeral for a "victim" of the Israel Defence Forces fell apart when those carrying the casket to the cemetery tripped over some rocks and the box fell twice to the ground. An angry "corpse" emerged from the planks, obviously hurt, and refused to go on with the ruse.

As reported by several media outlets over the past few months, including the Wall Street Journal Europe, renewed interest in the "martyrdom" story was triggered by obstinate and repeated requests from Stephane Juffa, managing editor of the Luxembourg-based Metula News Agency, supported by some leading French journalists, to be allowed to see the tape of the "shooting" in its entirety, despite the years of foot-dragging by the French television station and Enderlin.

Among other delaying tactics, Enderlin suggested that the images were "too unbearable [and] too graphic to be shown to the world." That might have been a reason for the public at large, but not a justification to prevent some seasoned journalists, who have seen their share of atrocities, to have a close look at the tape showing the "cruel" fate of young Mohammed al Dura.

What made the request even more important was that, while many other photographers and journalists were at that spot on that particular day, no one else filmed that particular incident, which allegedly lasted more than 45 minutes, or even reported it. Nobody else described seeing an ambulance carrying the body of the young victim, or any of the precise details given by Abu Rahma or Enderlin.

Another bone of contention was the unexplained discrepancy between Enderlin's claim that the shooting started at 3 p.m. and lasted about three-quarters of an hour, and the official statements by two physicians at Gaza's Shifa Hospital, where the alleged victim was supposedly delivered, indicating that the body of a young boy arrived at 1 p.m., or about two hours before the gunfire at the Netzarim junction even began.

Finally, last September, the management of France 2 reluctantly allowed three respected journalists – Luc Rozenzweig, formerly editor of Le Monde; Denis Jeamber of L'Express; and Daniel Leconte, a former reporter with France 2 – to view the entire tape. But, as reported in the Wall Street Journal, before the viewing even started, the legal counsel of the station came out with the following bombshell: "Did you know that Mr. Talal [Abu Rahma] has recanted his entire testimony?" he asked.

Of course they did not know, as no one else in the world was ever made aware of this startling revelation, kept hidden for the longest time, by the management of France 2. During the ensuing discussion, the three journalists learned that Abu Rahma was in Paris. They asked to interview him, to understand why he had given, three days after the incident, false, sworn testimony that made headlines around the world, only to recant it before the viewing of the tape. In spite of their efforts, even with the offer of making an Arabic translator available, the French government television station kept Abu Rahma incommunicado.

When it was finally played for the guests, the tape, which had been touted for four years as gruesome and unbearable, contained nothing even remotely connected with the killing. But it did provide some additional incredible information.

First, according to those who saw the tape, the boy, who was allegedly mortally wounded and slumped next to his father, is seen afterwards moving to his side and onto his stomach, looking into the camera and covering his face with his hands. Moreover, it demonstrated without any doubt that the young man shown at the beginning as Mohammed al Durra, was not the same as the child who died two hours earlier at the Shifa Hospital in Gaza. Even more amazing, there was no ambulance on the tape, no blood on the ground, no proof!

This explains the time difference, but not the entire apparent hoax.

While reviewing the myriad of websites dedicated to the incident, I came across a statement by Jamal al Durra, the father of the alleged martyr, given on Nov. 16, 2000, to a Palestinian journalist. In it, he declared that during the 45-minute shooting, he was hit by eight bullets, while his son was hit by four, one of them in the stomach.

On a different Palestinian website, I found the last images of the incident, provided by the cameraman, showing the child "collapsed" at his father's side, as well as a significant cache of information about the veracity of the incident. First, the website alleges that al Durra senior was also hit by a bullet in his stomach. The images show that the concrete wall next to the two was pock-marked by deep, round holes, the result of the direct impact from sizable, high-calibre bullets from high-powered, high-velocity machine guns, the same as the kind that allegedly injured al Durra and killed his son. Amazingly, however, in the last image, after the young man was supposedly already dead and his father badly injured in a 45-minute-long hail of bullets, there are absolutely no signs of injuries on either of them.

One can see with the naked eye that the white shirt worn by al Durra, apparently "injured eight times" in his right arm and elbow and other parts of his body, by bullets able to penetrate a concrete wall, was still white, without even a sprinkle of blood on him or on the ground. If the details reported about this prolonged shooting were true, common sense suggests both al Durra and his son should have been soaked with blood.

The absence of any traces of blood on the father and son's clothing or bodies, or splattered on the wall immediately behind them, or anywhere nearby, should have raised the eyebrows of every reporter or editor viewing the photos.

It didn't, and I wonder why!

After the whole affair became public, France 2 threatened legal action against anyone alleging that, for four long years the television station was involved in an elaborate, unprofessional attempt to demonize the state of Israel and its army.

Recently, however, some people have decide to confront France 2. One of them, a French man, Serge Farnel, has publicly accused France 2 on his website of concocting the story, and challenged its management to initiate legal action against him. The owner of the Paris-based rating agency Media Watch, Philippe Karsenty, has offered 10,000 Euros, to be paid to any charity chosen by France 2, if the station could demonstrate that Mohammed al Durra was killed by the Israelis, and also daring them to sue him. In response to media inquiries, the spokesperson for France 2 acknowledged that they were aware of the public skeptics but had no intention of taking them to court.

At the time of the writing of this article, the station has still not challenged any of its vocal critics in court.

Of course, one can speculate ad infinitum whether the whole affair was nothing but a premeditated and well-orchestrated propaganda attack against Israel perpetrated by Palestinian activists with the support of a French television station known for its pro-Arab sympathies. It could also be true that, what might have started as a simple fabrication by a partisan cameraman and a leftist French journalist could have mushroomed into a giant web of lies with a life of its own, aided and reinforced by a pliant and often anti-Semitic world media not ready to admit its blunders, biases and misconceptions. Perhaps, the coming months will bring some much needed closure to this dirty affair.

Meanwhile, the unprofessional attitude demonstrated by the journalists and management at France 2 appears to have touched a raw nerve, even with the powerful French union of audio-visual workers. In a recently released statement, the union declared that by its delaying tactics, "the station thus avoided any questions concerning the controversy, either about the topic at hand or about the station's respect for its own charter.

"It is more than time to get to the truth," the union concluded.

I couldn't agree more.

The modern Maccabiah

The 17th Maccabiah Games are scheduled to take place in Israel this summer. And with more than 6,000 athletes from over 50 countries expected to take part, they may well turn out to be the biggest ever held. In many respects, this is quite remarkable, especially when considering that the entire Maccabi structure was teetering in disarray with the off-again, on-again competition of 2001.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The Palestinian uprising was then at its height, and in the wake of consecutive terrorist atrocities, many delegations were much smaller than usual, or chose not to attend at all. In retrospect, however, those "guts and glory games," as they have since been termed, proved to be one of the most important and moving events in Maccabiah history. In the true spirit of the Macabees, athletes from all corners of the globe came to Israel at a time when fear and uncertainty were deterring so many others from visiting.

But triumph in the face of adversity is not new to the Maccabi movement.

From its earliest beginnings, the Maccabi tradition has been one of perseverance, courage and ingenuity, even in the face of often overwhelming odds. The very concept of the Games began with the vision of a 15-year-old, one Yosef Yekutieli, who was so inspired by news of the 1912 Olympic Games in Stockholm that he began obsessing on the notion of an Olympics for Jewish athletes in Eretz Yisrael.

For 10 long years, he grappled with what was then considered a crazy idea, and it took many more years before he was able to convince the leadership of the day that there was, in fact, merit to his proposal.

It was not until 1928 that his plan for a "Jewish Olympics" began to attract the serious attention of those who would later pave the way for the inaugural Maccabiah Games.

Those first Games took place in 1932, with 390 athletes from 14 countries participating. And while bringing athletes to Israel was one thing, providing them with proper facilities for training and competing was quite another.

However, nothing could dampen the resolve of those early sports pioneers. In the absence of a suitable running track, railwaymen were called in to lay a surface of crushed coal cinders. Longer running distances took place on the streets of Tel Aviv and along the beach, while the port waters of Haifa, in an area demarcated by rowboats and buoys, provided the venue for water polo and swimming.

By so vividly highlighting the involvement of Jews in sport – both in Israel and far beyond its borders – the 1932 Games were hailed as an enormous success. There would be much more to come.

The prophecy of Zechariah

By any measure, the story of the re-emergence of the Jewish people as a sovereign nation in our own age weighs in as an epic event.

The fact that Hebrew, remarkably little changed since the time of the great prophets thousands of years ago, is being used to describe the latest advances in information technology and biomedicine and my son's most recent electronic music compositions is an unparalleled accomplishment.

Ross Eglinor in Jerusalem

This capacity for transforming its wildest dreams and heavenly ideals into concrete earthly realities is perhaps the real hallmark of our culture. And there is little doubt in my mind, at least, that future generations will gaze back on our era and marvel. The establishment of the State of Israel will be right up there beside the exodus from Egypt and the return from Babylonian exile as a landmark event in the great saga of the Jewish nation.

Yet, for all that, I am also acutely aware of how nearness and familiarity are blinding. It gets to where we can no longer see and appreciate the extraordinary. You can't expect to be constantly flabbergasted, but it is important, I believe, to purposefully distance oneself occasionally, reflect quietly upon the wondrousness of this undertaking, and attempt to recover in some small degree the sense of thrill.

My personal disengagement strategy is to temporarily shut out all thoughts concerning the latest political intrigues, security threats, professional and family responsibilities and go into brief retreat at any one of a number of my favourite spots. There are many to choose from in a land whose hills, valleys, plains, rivers and deserts shaped and continue to shape the spirit and dreams of much of the world. In this mere postage stamp of territory, the concentration per square centimetre of wisdom, lore, sacred heritages and epic-making tales is surely the highest on earth.

The Beit Mahasseh plaza in the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City, one of my frequent haunts, is an unlikely candidate for this. You will find neither spectacular vistas there nor a legacy of heroic deeds. It is little more than a modest-sized courtyard surrounded by squarish apartment dwellings. Its sole distinction is that it is the place where, in 1948, the defeated and battered Jewish population within the Old City walls offered its surrender to the Jordanian Legion before being expelled.

Following the Israeli military triumphs of the Six Day War in 1967, the ancient Jewish neighbourhood was reconstructed and reinhabited with Israeli families. And today, nearly 40 years later, the sun-drenched pavement literally teems with young Jewish children at play. I like to sit myself down there under a large sycamore tree to watch. Wait long enough and some of the elderly inhabitants of the quarter are sure to appear. They, too, seat themselves on one of the wooden benches to rest weary legs.

How commonplace a scene one would easily conclude. But context is what gives meaning to things, and I know, therefore, that even the most ordinary aspects of our lives in Israel are imbued with a transcendent dimension. I have only to turn my attention to the Biblical quote, its square Hebrew letters engraved into the stone wall I am leaning against, to be reminded of it. I read it often, imagining as I do so my great ancestor, the Prophet Zechariah, pining away in exile 2,600 years ago for a Jerusalem ravaged by the Babylonians. He had little obvious cause for optimism when he said: "Thus says the Lord of hosts: 'Old men and old women will again sit in the streets of Jerusalem, canes in hand on account of their old age. And the streets of the city will be full again with boys and girls playing in them.'"

And before my eyes the children play in Jerusalem, and the old people, their canes in their hands, look on in silent pleasure. And there is something of unequalled magnificence in this indomitable Jewish spirit that only the blind, deaf, obtuse and ignorant among us could somehow fail to notice, be amazed at and take justified pride in.

In today's Israel, the old myths don't apply

If you have visited Israel lately, you may have noticed that we are laughing a bit more, walking taller and talking more optimistically. The black humour of the past four years hasn't disappeared, and the loss of more than 1,000 Israelis still burns, but the bitter edge is less pronounced.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

And while unemployment is still too high, as are the income gaps, the economy has bounced back, and the stock market is booming. It turns out that the prophets of gloom were wrong, and now that Yasser Arafat's terror war is over, Israelis have gone back to grappling with the core challenges of state building and charting a future that will guide the survival of the Jewish people.

In this process, the Israeli political and social landscape is also changing rapidly, and if you haven't paid attention over the last few years, or are clinging to old myths, the scenery may be unrecognizable.

The venerable Labor party is in total disarray after leading the Oslo catastrophe and has no visible national leader, other than Shimon Peres, a respected octogenarian, but without much influence.

On the other side of the spectrum, Likud is in the middle of its own civil war, like Labor was a few years ago, between pragmatists and ideologues.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who provided the strategic and ideological rationale of the settlement movement for many years, is bitterly accused of betraying its core principles. While it is too early to predict the results of these changes, the dynamics of Israeli society make this process of determining the future direction of the Jewish people very exciting.

But for people who are out of touch with Israeli realities, and who are unable to understand these processes, the old myths and static images present a very misleading picture.

Naomi Klein, who writes occasional political commentary for the Globe and Mail, is a case in point. Last September, she wrote a piece titled "The Likudization of the world," which was very critical of Sharon's and Israel's anti-terror policies and the lessons that are being drawn by the "Likudniks" in the United States, Russia and elsewhere.

Beyond feeding conspiracy theories, her ideological filters removed the essential fact that the policies used in fighting the Palestinian terror campaign, including the isolation of Arafat, while imperfect, were far more successful than could have been predicted, even by their main supporters.

In trying to make her case, Klein emphasizes the term "Likudization" and claims to discern (then criticizes) a "Likud doctrine," spearheaded by Sharon. But this approach is, at best, a simple-minded anachronism.

Israel's professional response to terrorism, based on pre-emptive attacks on terrorist networks, targeted killings, high-level intelligence and internal security (guards at mall entrances, theatres, buses, etc.), is not the product of a political party, but rather the work of political leadership, the IDF and other security services, and a national will to survive. The Likud in Klein's caricature simply does not exist.

Reflecting the bias shared by many self-proclaimed intellectuals and "Middle East experts" (not only in Canada), Klein also attacked "Sharon's rigid views" – the same Sharon that his bitter critics in the Likud attack for betrayal. In pressing for disengagement from Gaza, Sharon has alienated his former core constituency. The plan to pull 8,000 plus Israelis from their homes in Gaza is very painful, and it's the central issue on the Israeli agenda today. Sharon's determination to proceed, despite the risks that it will destroy his political career and his own party, marks a fundamental break from the past and is hardly a reflection of "rigid views."

This debate, and the effort to define pragmatic policies in the very uncertain post-Arafat era, are central dimensions in Israel's political and social dynamism. The details of these changes may be difficult to follow from the outside, but ignoring them paints a very distorted picture of today's Israeli realities. For Klein and others who cling to the old images of Israel, the time for a re-acquaintance visit is long overdue.

The Kirshner File

Time is running out for the Jews of Cochin

Bristling with impatience that bordered on rudeness, Sammy Hallegua was clearly in no mood to talk to yet another inquisitive foreign journalist who would doubtless ply him with the same predictable round of questions about his colourful but dying community. Now 73, Hallegua is one of the last of the Mohicans, a Jew from Cochin, or Kochi, the "Queen of the Arabian Sea." In Malayalam, the local language, Kochi means small lagoon.

Sheldon Kirshner in Fort Cochin

Jewish traders first arrived here, in the southern Indian state of Kersala, during the biblical era. They would be known as the Malabar or "black" Jews owing to their integration with the indigenous inhabitants. Judging by historical lore, King Solomon maintained a thriving commercial relationship with Cochin, which is famous for its natural harbour and spices.

From the 16th century, Jews from Spain, Syria, Iraq, Egypt and Germany – commonly referred to as the Pardesi or "white" Jews – began immigrating to India. By the 1940s, several thousand Jews lived in greater Cochin, which consists of a few tropical islands – principally Fort Cochin, Willimgdon, Mattancherry and Vypeen – and abuts the booming mainland town of Ernakulam.

Virtually all the Jews of Cochin lived in Fort Cochin – the site of India's first church, built by Portuguese Franciscan friars in 1503 – from 1524 onward. They were mainly concentrated in Jewtown, a moniker not considered politically incorrect in the 16th century. Within the boundaries of Jewtown, and next to a Hindu temple, is the Pardesi Synagogue, the oldest shul in India and the Commonwealth. Finished in 1568, it was destroyed by the Portuguese and rebuilt in 1664, a year after the Dutch drove the intolerant Portuguese colonialists out of Cochin.

In 1795, Cochin passed into the British sphere of influence, and there it snugly remained until India achieved independence in 1947. Cochin's Jewish community, numbering some 3,000, was then at its demographic height. When the Pardesi Synagogue marked its 400th anniversary in 1968, an event India commemorated with a special postage stamp and a visit from its prime minister, Cochin's Jewish population had declined to 500.

Since then, two factors – emigration, particularly to Israel, and attrition – have bitten into the thinning ranks of the Jewish population. According to Hallegua – whose family came here from Spain via Aleppo, Syria, in 1586 – there are a grand total of 15 Pardesi Jews, aged 30 to 84, in Fort Cochin today. Some 40 Malabar Jews live in Ernakulam and a further 15 to 20 in neighbouring towns. Despite my best efforts, I was unable to contact any Malabar Jews. Cochin's population also comprises Hindus – the predominant group – Muslims, Christians, Buddhists, Jains, Sikhs and Anglo-Indians (the descendants of British settlers and Indians).

Hallegua, casually clad in white shorts and a short-sleeved white shirt and speaking with a plummy Anglo-Indian accent typical of India's upper classes, received me in his dim parlour in Jewtown. The spacious room, cooled by low-hanging fans, was filled with framed family portraits, some of vintage appearance. Sitting there, I felt like I had been thrown into E.M. Forster's atmospheric novel A Passage to India.

A prosperous, no-nonsense businessman who managed a chain of stores and a farm ("our bread and butter, so to speak"), he was reluctant to discuss the state of his depleted community. He is simply sick of the topic.

When I told Hallegua – the unofficial spokesperson of Pardesi Jews – that I had come thousands of miles from Canada to speak to him, he seemed unimpressed. "All of them are from faraway places," he countered. But I persisted, and he relented.

The gist of our relatively brief conversation was that time is running out for the Jews of Fort Cochin. He is a microcosm of the situation. Hallegua has two grown children and both have immigrated to the United States. "Better job opportunities," he explained.

As for himself, he said, "I'm too old to leave, but I like India. I don't want to go anywhere else. We have a 400-year friendship with families here. It's difficult to give up all these things."

Cochin once had eight functioning synagogues. But nowadays, there is only one, the historic Pardesi shul, which is really more like a museum than a synagogue in terms of its usage. "We never had a rabbi, but we had learned people who were, well, rabbis. We were a self-sufficient community."

Jewtown in Fort Cochin bustles with activity

When I asked him whether Fort Cochin's community has a viable future, he replied, "I don't think so. This is the fate of small Jewish communities."

He was none too pleased when I broached the subject of the community's white/black divisions. He denied that the two groups had been or still are alienated from each other. But he acknowledged that Pardesi Jews traditionally have not taken darker-skinned Malabar Jewish as marriage partners. "It had nothing to do with colour," he claimed. "Black was a term introduced by the British."

True or not, these caste-like fissures were exacerbated by the presence of yet a third category of Jews, the meshuhrarim, the descendants of freed slaves. These rifts splintered Cochin Jewry into separate solitudes.

Judging by a set of crudely drawn murals in an annex of the Pardesi Synagogue, the original Jewish residents of Cochin, intrepid traders from the land of Israel, settled in India during antiquity. But the exact date of their arrival is unknown. What seems certain is that they traded in teak, ivory, spices and peacock feathers, and that they settled in Kudungallur, then known as Cranganore.

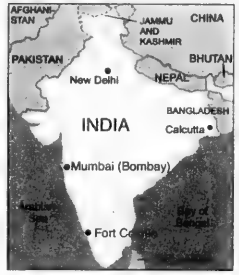
In gratitude for their contribution to the economy, the local Indian ruler, Sri Parkaran Iravi Vanmar, gave the Jews the village of Anjuvannam and two copper plates on which their rights were embossed. These plates, in Tamil and Malayalam, are deposited in a bank vault in Cochin, Hallegua disclosed.

Jews lived in Cranganore in peace and tranquillity. But in 1524, Moors, backed by the Indian ruler of Calicut, attacked the Jews over a dispute concerning the regional pepper trade. Lacking an army, the Jews requested protection from a Hindu raja. He invited them to settle in what would become Jewtown. Prospering in Jewtown until the dark Portuguese interregnum, they rebounded during the Dutch and British periods.

Today, Jewtown consists of a few narrow streets with a quaint jumble of handicraft and spice shops. Several are adorned with Stars of David, presumably for the benefit of tourists. One shop, Sarah Embroidery, is owned by Sarah Cohen, a wizened woman of 80 who works with a Muslim assistant. She can usually be found sitting on a stool busily embroidering yarmulkes on sale for 500 rupees – or about $15.

Jewtown is also lined with architecturally interesting buildings, warehouses and the boarded-up Kadavambagam Synagogue. The Jewish cemetery lies close by.

No trip to Fort Cochin would be complete without a visit to the Pardesi Synagogue – a magnificent structure with a dazzling white stucco facade, an imposing clock tower, a ladies' gallery, pale blue interior walls, an azure ceiling, glass chandeliers and oil lamps, teak benches, 1,100 delicately hand-painted blue Chinese floor tiles and weathered tombstones with Hebrew lettering leaning against a wall in the courtyard.



By any measure, the synagogue is a fitting monument to an exotic Diaspora community whose rich historical, cultural and religious traditions are seamlessly woven into the bright fabric of India's national tapestry.

IDF soldiers connect with Toronto youth

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Two groups of elite Israel Defense Forces (IDF) soldiers have just completed a two week visit across Canada, including a stop in Toronto, to build on the friendships and understanding already forged through their participation in the mifgash (encounter) program organized by Canada Israel Experience (CIE). The UJA Federation-affiliated Canada Israel Experience provides structured, educational trips, including birthright israel, for Jewish young people.

IDF Lt. Erez Neeman

The mifgash program, that began as a pilot project last year with four IDF soldiers visiting several Jewish communities and campuses in select regions of Canada, has received a nod of approval from both birthright israel and, more importantly, the IDF, whose consent to relieve a handful of its elite soldiers for two weeks is critical to the program.

"The army knows it's getting back better soldiers from what we experience in each community," said IDF Lieutenant Erez Neeman, staff officer in the IDF's Air Force headquarters.

"We anticipated that the mifgash program would have a tremendous impact on Canadian participants," said CIE National Director Michael Soberman, "but we could not fathom the positive effect it has had on the Israeli soldiers."

The visiting soldiers, who are between the ages of 21 and 24, met primarily with Canadian university students and addressed both Jewish and non-Jewish groups, eliciting provocative discussions about Israel's security fence and the ongoing Israel-Palestinian struggle. The soldiers also spoke to a group of UJA Federation leading donors at the home of Lesley Binstock Offman and Allan Offman.

"The most interesting lesson for us is that when you live your life in a Jewish country, like myself, you don't struggle with your Jewish identity," Neeman told the donors. "Abroad, it's so much more complex to take an active role as both a Jew and a citizen in another country. This has impacted us so deeply," he said.

While the soldiers' visit has helped expose Canadians to a perspective not readily available from the media, the Israeli soldiers, according to First Sergeant Yoav Iron, are benefiting as well.

"I am strengthened when someone on the outside, in the Diaspora, supports me," Iron said. "Another benefit of the exchange is that we have learned about the need to advocate for Israel," added Neeman.

"We could not believe the incidents on campuses that take place without severe repercussion," observed First Sergeant Yuval Freeman, a commander in a paratroopers brigade. "We were blown away by the prevalence of pro-Palestinian demonstrations, distribution of propaganda and how some have succeeded in barring speakers, such as [former Israeli Prime Ministers Benjamin] Netanyahu and [Ehud] Barak at Concordia. How frightening to see our rights violated," he said.

On the prowl for a name

Introducing Walk with Israel's new mascot

This year's annual UJA Federation Walk with Israel, taking place in downtown Toronto on Sunday, May 29, is already generating buzz as organizers are on the prowl in search of a name for the first-ever Walk mascot, a lovable and friendly lion.

"We wanted to add something new and exciting to what has become the most popular family oriented, community-wide event of the year," said Sara Zagdanski, co-chair of this year's walk, along with her three sisters-in-law, Felicia Posluns, Beth Singer and Nelly Zagdanski.

"The lion will serve as a brand that will help people, particularly kids, immediately identify with the walk," she explained.

Aside from appearing at the walk itself, the lion will be roaring into schools to generate excitement among the many students who seek sponsors prior to the highly anticipated event that attracts over 20,000 participants.

The lion-naming contest is open to all ages. Submissions will be accepted until Friday, February 25. The winner will receive a pair of Toronto Raptor tickets and will appear front and centre to kick off the largest solidarity walk for Israel in the world.

There are various ways to enter the contest: on-line at www.jewishtoronto.com; by e-mailing elivertovsky@ujafed.org; by phoning Elana at 416-635-2883 ext. 329; or by faxing 416-635-9565, Attention: Elana.

Centre Camp brings a bit of Israel home to Toronto

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's day camp, called Centre Camp, is going to great lengths to incorporate Israel into its programming.

"In an effort to provide our campers with more cultural programs, Centre Camp and Canada Israel Experience formed a partnership to offer camp staff and alumni a once in a lifetime birthright israel experience," said Andrew Levy, Centre Camp's director. "This was their opportunity to experience Israel and Zionist programming first hand and bring it back home to Toronto for enhanced programming in the summer."

The recent trip was also an opportunity for participants to be welcomed, in return, by several Israelis who were at Centre Camp in the past, either as staff or campers. "It was a perfect continuation of the relationships started at camp," said Kevin Knopman, Center Camp's assistant director and one of the individuals who was instrumental in bringing Israelis to the camp.

Last summer's Centre Camp staff included two Israeli shlichim (Hebrew for emissaries), through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) - one of UJA Federation's overseas partners. These shlichim will be retuning to camp in July for a second summer along with two new staff.

Knopman believes the work of staff who joined the recent birthright israel program will be enhanced this coming summer. It was the only CIE trip that included a visit to Eilat, which, together with the surrounding Eilot region, is twinned with Toronto under the Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative. The relationship has enabled several teenagers from Eilat to attend Center Camp, in past summers.

"I can now carry back a message to camp that, before, only the shlichim could convey," shared David Brinder, 23, a Centre Camp staff member and birthright israel participant returning to Centre Camp for his fourth summer this July. "We were in a place where we all belong. We saw our history come to life through the physical ruins and our guide's stories. That is the message I intend to share with other staff and campers this summer."

New chairs named for Campaign 2006

Kimel and Sherman ready to take on challenge

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2006 are Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman, who will work together with vice-chair Brad Fox and Linda Frum, the chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

"I was so moved when I was asked to take on this important responsibility - moved and pleasantly surprised," says Sherman, a member of the UJA Federation board, who is a member of the executive of Mount Sinai Hospital Women's Auxiliary, and the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary. Sherman is also on the board of the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

"How could I say no to having the opportunity to help raise funds and awareness for our community here in Toronto as well as in Israel."

"I thought this would be a tremendous challenge; one that I simply couldn't say no to," says Kimel, who currently chairs UJA Federation's new task force on community security and has headed, in the past, several other UJA Federation committees, including Partnership 2000 (P2K), which builds bridges between Toronto and Eilat. "As a past chair of P2K, I've been going to Israel twice a year for quite a while. I know what the needs are in our community as well as in Israel and I'm looking to raise more money during this campaign than ever before."

Warren Kimel

Honey Sherman

Kimel and Sherman will soon be visiting Israel to assess needs there and, in Toronto, Kimel sees local security as a crucial concern. "Campaign 2006 will definitely address security concerns in our own city," says Kimel. "This will be the first campaign that will begin with local security as one of its key elements. We've already hired a company to assess the security of our schools and institutions, and we'll go from there."

"Just look at the effort put forth - and the amount of money raised through UJA Federation for the recent tsunami victims," Sherman says. "Through UJA, our community raised $1.4 million within a two week period with absolutely no solicitation for funds or goods. We collectively showed our understanding and compassion for those in peril wherever they may be. This outpouring from the community bodes well for our upcoming campaign. Just imagine what we are capable of achieving for Campaign 2006."

JDC ground work in Southeast Asia continues in full force

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) is still busy on the ground in areas devastated by the December 26 tsunami, which killed over 250,000 people and displaced millions more.

The funds raised by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which surpassed $1.4 million, along with the worthy efforts of many other North American federations, have been allocated to JDC which continues to work with local non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in assessing and implementing relief programs.

In Sri Lanka, JDC has partnered with Sarvodaya, a renowned local NGO, to reach some 47,000 individuals on the east coast. The focus is on the provision of psychosocial support services for women, children and the elderly. Through this partnership JDC is providing some 2,000 children with school kits containing uniforms, shoes, socks, school bags, workbooks and writing equipment.

Judy Amit, JDC's director for India, has been travelling tirelessly between the hardest hit regions of several countries.

"On my trip south I visited an Internally Displaced Persons (IDP) relief camp situated in Sri Lanka," Amit observed.

"Standing around in the large courtyard were the displaced persons. There were many teenagers who were not all what you would expect teenagers to be – they were quite, solemn, serious, clustering around in small groups. The women who were mothers were clutching their wide eyed babies and toddlers, not letting them out of their sight, and the men standing alone, were silently smoking. In this particular camp there are no activities for children, although I was told that at other camps activities are being organized by volunteers."

According to Amit, the relief camp houses some 1,400 people, who are crammed into two large halls the size of basketball courts. Although there seemed to be plenty of food and water, there was no privacy or anywhere for an individual to find a minute of reflective solitude. "Perhaps," said Amit, "this is what is needed at times like this – to be with other people who have gone through similar experiences."

Amit said the coastal areas that have been affected are some of the poorest in Sri Lanka. "They are the poorest of the poor," she noted. "These are the people who are most going to need our assistance for the long term."

Israeli ambassador meets with Toronto's Israeli leaders

Forty of Toronto's Israeli leaders were guests of UJA Federation last week for a dinner meeting featuring an address by the Israeli Ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker. Jews, Muslims honour York Region police chief

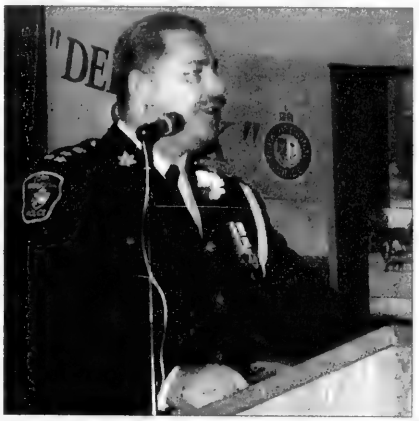
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

About 300 Jews and Muslims gathered recently to honour York Region police chief Armand La Barge for promoting race relations in the region.

The evening was organized by Temple Har Zion and the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat of Toronto (ISIJ), with support from the Mosaic Group, an interfaith organization.

The seed for the idea to honour La Barge, said temple president Ron Smith, was planted at the time of last year's anti-Semitic acts that took place in and around York Region.



York Region police chief Armand La Barge

"His empathy for the pain of our community was heartfelt and his leadership and actions during that period helped the community through troubled times. The chief shows the same level of caring and commitment to the many diverse communities in York Region and beyond," Smith said.

The ISIJ operates five religious centres in the GTA, including the Jaffari Islamic Centre in Thornhill, which shares a driveway with Temple Har Zion.

ISIJ president Nazir Gulamhussein, said that the fact that the two houses of worship can share a common driveway, proves that if people want to work together it is possible to do so.

"Through interaction and an open community we can remove barriers. [We are fortunate] that that is what Canada is about," he said.

Speaker after speaker at the event recognized La Barge for his outstanding contribution and dedication in fighting racism and promoting a peaceful co-existence between citizens in a multicultural city.

La Barge, 51, who began his career with York Regional Police in 1973, was promoted to the rank of deputy chief in 1999. He has been chief for just over two years, and is the first vice-president of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police.

Michael Bryant, Ontario's attorney general, who works with La Barge, said, "I'm here to celebrate that the chief was part of the headlines when there was [the] spate of hate crimes in York Region. When the crisis ended, [he continued to do work] that did not make the headlines. [Being the police chief] is not a job for him, it is a calling."

Recalling the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, Leo Adler, director of national affairs of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said that anti-Semitism was part of the mindset in Canada at that time, as well. "There was no police chief to protect the ethnic minority, no police chief to say 'this is immoral.'"

Thornhill is now home to one of the largest Jewish communities in Canada, he said, "but even here, hatred has reared its ugly head. Last year's acts of vandalism drove a knife into the hearts of those who survived [the Holocaust] and those who were born because these survivors survived."[La Barge] stepped in to affirm and reaffirm the rule of law, and [sought] out those who were responsible. He is a mensch and a man of humanity," said Adler, who sent regards to La Barge from 96-year-old Simon Wiesenthal.

After receiving an Inuit stone carving from community representatives, La Barge said that he is sharing the honour with other community-minded individuals. "I recognize all the [police officers] who embrace the diversity that is York Region.

"Ours is a community in transition. There are 70 different languages spoken, and [there are] countless places of worship. We have demonstrated that we can find strength in diversity, and as Canadians, we have much to teach the world.

"Your recognition of our efforts to build bridges is an important step forward," La Barge said.

Other speakers included Susan Kadis, MP for Thornhill; Mario Racco, Thornhill MPP; Glenn MacDonnell, C.E.O. Ontario Special Olympics; Jack Clancey, state deputy, Knights of Columbus; and Faisal Kutty from the Canadian Council of American-Islamic Relations.

Palestinian peace advocate exudes hope, despair

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Palestinian historian and campaigner for peace recently brought a mixed message of hope and despair to Toronto.

Nazmi Amin Al-Ju'beh expressed optimism Israel and the Palestinian Authority can reach a truce to end the violence of the current intifadah. But he voiced pessimism they can resolve their most pressing differences in final status talks.

Ju'beh, a professor at Birzeit University, was a member of the Palestinian team that conducted pre-Oslo negotiations with Israel in Washington, D.C, from 1992 to 1994.

In addition, he was one of the signers of the 2003 Geneva accord, a detailed, unofficial blueprint for reconciliation between Israel and the Palestinians turning on the internationally endorsed road map to peace and the parameters set out by Bill Clinton, the then president of the United States, almost five years ago.

Here at the invitation of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Ju'beh was accompanied by Menachem Klein, an Israeli co-signer of the Geneva agreement. He is a senior lecturer in political science at Bar-Ilan University and served as an adviser to Israel's prime minister, Ehud Barak, during the Camp David summit in July 2000.

Fresh from speaking engagements in Montreal and Ottawa, Ju'beh and Klein addressed students at the University of Toronto and York University on the prospects for peace in the wake of Yasser Arafat's death and the accession to power of his successor, Mahmoud Abbas.

By coincidence, they arrived in Toronto on the day Israel and the Palestinian Authority resumed high-level diplomatic contacts and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon promised to suspend the targeted killings of Palestinian militants, amid speculation the Israeli army would soon withdraw from five towns in the West Bank.

In an interview with journalists at a restaurant, in which he discussed a variety of prime topics, Ju'beh said he is confident Israel and the Palestinians can work out a ceasefire and prepare the ground for permanent status talks on such contentious issues as borders, Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

However, he said he doubted whether Sharon would embrace the principles of the Geneva accord – which he has bitterly criticized – or conduct final status talks to resolve Israel's long conflict with the Palestinians.

"He's ideologically opposed to these parameters," said Ju'beh, 49, who was born in the Jewish quarter of east Jerusalem, which was annexed by Israel in 1967.

The accord was signed in Switzerland by, among others, Yasser Abed Rabbo and Yossi Beilin. Rabbo was the former Palestinian information minister, while Beilin was the onetime Israeli justice minister.

It calls for a truce and mutual recognition, an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a demilitarized Palestinian state with eastern Jerusalem as its capital and a resolution of the refugee problem largely through the resettlement of refugees in Palestine.

Ju'beh said Palestinians will accept nothing less than a state based on the pre-1967 frontiers. If the Israeli government demands border rectifications, the Palestinians will ask for an equal amount of land in Israel.

By his reckoning, Sharon wants to keep from 20 per cent to 30 per cent of the West Bank, an unacceptable demand in the Palestinian national consensus.

Nor will the Palestinians be satisfied with a state with provisional borders. "This was a failure of Oslo," Ju'beh said, referring to the now-defunct Oslo peace process. "We have to go directly to final status talks."

An absolute majority of Palestinians are ready for a two state solution, but time is running out for this solution because the Jewish settler population in the West Bank is increasing, he warned.

Asked for his opinion of a one-state solution, Ju'beh replied, "I'm not opposed ideologically to it, if Palestinians and Israelis want it. But it's not realistic or doable."

Ju'beh said Palestinians like himself seek a "just solution" to the refugee problem. Under his scenario, refugees would be resettled in Palestine and compensated for their losses. And in a humanitarian gesture acknowledging some responsibility for their plight, Israel would absorb 100,000 to 200,000 refugees, he added.

"Not every refugee will be happy to give up the right of return," Ju'beh said. "But most don't have the illusion they can go back. The majority will stay where they are now."

Although he would prefer an "open city" plan under which Jerusalem would be the capital of both states, Ju'beh recognizes that partition is a necessity.

Echoing an idea espoused by Abbas, Ju'beh said the second Palestinian uprising has been counter-productive for his people.

"I was against it from the start," he explained. "We lost many friends in Israel who support a two-state solution. Our society was destroyed systematically. A lot of Palestinians were killed and injured and arrested. And we lost a lot of international support. I am asked, 'Why do you send suicide bombers to buses?'"

Condemning suicide attackers, Ju'beh said, "They have been very successful in imposing their agenda on the Palestinians, and we let them do this."

By the same token, Ju'beh likened the building of settlements in the territories to "an act of terror."

In his comments, Klein said Jews in the West Bank and Gaza regard territorial concessions as a catastrophe, and will resist an Israeli withdrawal, partly because their very identity is inextricably bound up with the setttlements.

He suggested Sharon's strategy is to cut Palestinian areas in the West Bank into disconnected bantustans in a bid to impose a solution on the Palestinians.

The true gift of God

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

Prayer (tfillah) is a time for profound personal reflection on our lives and where we stand. It is a time to ask why we suffer and why we hurt.

This article will attempt to probe for insights into reaching the peace of mind we long for. This longing is the key to our quest for God and spirituality.

In his Gesher HaChaim (Bridge of Life) the Gaon HaRav Yechiel Michel Tucazinsky makes an interesting remark regarding this longing. He writes, "Man strives throughout his life to perpetuate his name and memory. He hopes that his name will not be blotted out from the world even after he has departed from it, and his memory will live on forever.

"This aspiration derives from a higher source, from the soul's sensing that it indeed survives even after its separation from the body, that even after the body has decomposed, the self will remain, perpetuated by its deeds and achievements."

The spiritual in man senses instinctively that survival is a fact. The personality longs for this survival. Herein lies the paradox of those who do not necessarily believe in the survival of the soul. Why do they have the longing and desire to be remembered?

It seems clear to me that this is not some vain desire for fame. Instead, it is a deep and powerful drive of the soul's longing for its source.

This idea is apparent in the conversation between Moses and the Eternal in parshat Ki Tisa (Exodus 33:13): "And now, if I have indeed found favour in Your eyes, make the uniformity of Your ways known to me…" According to the Talmud Berachot 7a, Moses is asking the Eternal to make known how the world is governed amidst the ironies of earthly existence. The Talmud records in the name of Moses: "Ribono Shel Olam (Master of the Universe), why is it that some righteous people prosper and some others are in adversity, some wicked people prosper and some others are in adversity?"

Moses proceeds to make another bold request: "Then he said, 'Please show me Your glory'" (Exodus 33:18).

Moses then asks to see the Eternal directly. The response: "I shall cause all My goodness (Kol Touvi) to pass before you, and I shall call out with the name HaShem before you; and I shall show favour when I shall show favour, and I shall have mercy when I shall have mercy. You shall not be able to see My face, for no human can see My face and live…" (Exodus 33:19).

The Eternal agrees to grant Moses' initial request to understand the uniformity of the Eternal's diverse ways of governing the entire universe. And this HaShem does by showing him all God's goodness.

What goodness are we describing here? We may have a clue by referring to the original use of the word good (tov) in the Torah: "And God created man in His image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them" (Genesis 1: 27).

"And it was so. And God saw all that He had made and behold it was very good (tov me'od)…"(Genesis 1:31).

What is this "good"? It is the longing of the soul to connect with its source: "You shall know today, and return it to your heart that HaShem is God in heaven above and on the earth below… (Deuteronomy 4:39).

"You shall know" refers to intellectual knowledge; "return it to your heart" refers to knowledge that penetrates into the subconscious and so influences our actions.

It is time for deep soul-searching to nurture spiritual strength by correcting our negative character traits and aligning our moral fibre with Torah values. We must search to reclaim our peace of mind, which is the true gift from the Almighty. Peace of mind is a by-product of integrity and profound trust in HaShem. The pathway to this soul-searching process is the service of the heart. And what is the service of the heart? Our sages tell us it is tfillah. The quest for spirituality not only begins in the heart but also ends there, too. May we all pray for guidance and peace of mind.

Magazine for kids: blessing or curse?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the most imaginative ventures to come along in recent years in the area of Jewish publishing for kids is the magazine BabagaNewz. With the motto "Jewish kids exploring the world," this monthly enterprise currently has 1,200 day and congregational school subscribers across North America, as well as thousands of individual readers.

Designed for students in grades 4 to 7, it explores Judaism in an idiosyncratically engaging way. Recent tasty fare in BabagaNewz included a quiz that tested in what ways kids feel closest to God, a stamp contest in which the winning design will be produced as a real Israeli stamp, a lesson in which students learn through the prism of Jewish sources about the carnage currently taking place in Sudan, an exploration of exactly how candles burn as a means of understanding the laws of Shabbat connected to candlelighting, and a hiddur mitzvah project. The articles are intelligently written, the graphics are lively and the attempt to be interactive is constant.

I do not mean this as a plug for the magazine, in which I have no vested interest. It is rather a symbol of the war presently being carried out against rampant assimilation, and of the kind of creativity that will be vital to address this scourge. The case of BabagaNewz is actually a telling indicator of both the possibilities and the problems in the frenetic push to get Jewish kids "over the hump" of secularism and into Jewish commitments.

Funded by the Avi Chai Foundation, the magazine's stated aims are "to encourage students to view life through a Jewish lens" and to promote the spread of "Jewish values," goals that could scarcely be problematic in anyone's eyes. But again, the question of how this translates into long-term devotion to a consistent pattern of Jewish observance, or even further, a life where mitzvah stands at the forefront, is less easy to predict.

In a deep sense, it is actually the magazine's ostentatiously innovative approach to seducing Jewish tweeners into accepting that Judaism is "with it" that ironically is both its blessing and perhaps its biggest curse, the same curse that befuddles all of modern Jewish education.

There is, of course, nothing wrong with making one's product – in this instance, Judaism – inviting and esthetically pleasing. There is also nothing wrong with translating an ancient set of codes into terms that speak to modern youth. But it is a remarkably thin line between such methods and the slide into co-opting Judaism by desperately marketing it as "relevant."

The slickness of BabagaNewz almost serves to emphasize just how tenuous is the viability of that old-time religion lying just beneath the lovely patina of Jewish values and Jewish identity that beckons their readers.

As author and speaker Rabbi David Gottlieb once pointed out, the question is what is the standard of relevance? Is it Judaism that must be measured against modernity or is the reverse true, that the Torah sees itself as the supreme standard of meaning against which all else must ultimately be appraised?

Alongside contemporary efforts to jazz up Jewish education, our eyes must never lose sight of the prize bound up inextricably with our destiny as a people chosen by God at Sinai, a people who, with prescient naivete, proclaimed, "We will do and then we will understand."

A lively look at the sin of greed

Books
Bernard Baskin

Greed: The Seven Deadly Sins* by Phyllis A. Tickle, Oxford University Press.

"Why does he want more money?" asked my friend at lunch, referring to a third man we both know. "He's got more money then he needs, and he'll probably kill himself trying to double his fortune."

The answer, of course, is greed. Wisdom includes our ability to distinguish our needs from our greed. This acumen was lacking in the farmer who insisted, "I'm not greedy, all I want is that land next to mine."

A few years ago, a woman died in Paris. She had the dubious reputation of being the best dressed woman in Europe. After her death, it was found that the chief item of her legacy to the world was a wardrobe containing almost a thousand dresses. Garments became the limit of her horizon.

Think how having a thousand possible changes of costume would complicate life! Imagine the strain of having to decide every morning which one of a thousand costumes we would wear for the first hour of the day. That is a burden from which God in his mercy has relieved most of us.

Yet no one is immune to the possibility of a similar fate. We are never free from the insistent persuasion to buy and earn more and more. Enough is never quite enough.

Many years ago, Rudyard Kipling delivered a commencement address at McGill University in Montreal. He said one striking thing that deserves to be remembered. He was warning the students against being overly concerned about money, position or glory.

He said: "Some day you will meet a man who cares for none of these things. Then you will know how poor you are."

These reflections result from a reading of Phyllis Tickle's slim volume on the subject of greed, one of the so called Seven Deadly Sins (i.e. envy, gluttony, lust, greed, anger, pride, sloth).

Greed is sometimes regarded as the mother of all sins because it is the well-spring, if sometimes indirectly, of all other transgressions. It is known by many names and appears in many guises: avidity, avarice, cupidity and covetousness.

Tickle, a prolific author, theologian and radio personality, approaches her many-sided subject chronologically – from St. Paul to our own time, focusing on how greed has been depicted in western literature and art – often as gross, ugly and frightening.

Judaism, of course, is not silent on the subject. The Book of Proverbs baldly states, "A greedy man stirs up strife." Isaiah warns, "Woe to those who join house to house and field to field until there is no more room."

The Talmud, over and over again, inveighs against greed. "Who is rich? He who rejoices in his lot." And "When the camel demanded horns, they cut off his ears."

Our culture, in one way or another, has made all of us partisans in greed. The author writes, "Our guilt in the whole thing is no different from Martha Stewart's or Bernie Ebber's or Jack Welch's or even the NBA players', for that matter. We differ from them, most of us, only in degree, not in intention."

Students of human nature suggest that many people who are engaged in the unending pursuit of material possessions are caught up in a game that must be played for its own sake. For others, it is a pathway to self-esteem. And for others still, a way of finding community stature in a culture that equates money with success.

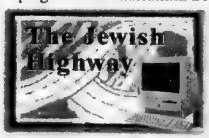
Greed, an essay of about 50 pages is lively and provocative – perhaps a bit too scholarly and erudite – a worthy addition to a memorable series of books co-sponsored by the New York Public Library and Oxford University Press.

Israeli educational programs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Winter is barely half over; so what better time to think about… summer? If you are a high school or university student looking for a summer program in Israel, start your hunt on the Jewish highway. Today, a look at programs where you can hone your Hebrew, delve into the history of the Middle East or gain new insights into Judaism.

There are many wonderful programs to go to in Israel this summer. My goal is to tell you about a few of the most interesting ones and give you information where you can search for one that meets your own needs.



But first, let's look at safety. Until the start of the current intifadah in October 2000, Ha'aretz points out that thousands of students participated in programs at Israeli institutions affiliated with American universities. A series of events curtailed those numbers drastically: the attack on a cafeteria at Hebrew University in 2002 and the U.S. State Department's addition of Israel to a list of dangerous areas. As a result, many universities decided to impose restrictions and even penalties on students studying in Israel. Jewish organizations feel that the universities have over-reacted and have organized campaigns such as "Let Our Students Go" to convince the universities to ease up on the restrictions. [http://tinyurl.com/4g22d]

To soothe the white-knuckled parents concerned about their children spending a summer in Israel, the Jewish Week reports an interesting trend. Organizations like Habonim-Dror and the Conservative movement's United Synagogue Youth have sponsored trips for parents to see what conditions in Israel are really like. After visiting the country themselves, parents overwhelmingly give their kids the thumbs-up. [http://tinyurl.com/5wuke]

And numbers are up. After the horrendous bombing of Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium in 2001, the Reform Movement cancelled its summer programs in Israel. Last year, the Reform Movement's four-month High School in Israel program attracted 66 students, the most in the program's 43 years of existence. "The situation has definitely been quieter in the past few months, and parents have decided that a careful and cautiously run program can be appropriate for their kids," one parent told the Forward. [http://tinyurl.com/5goh7]

Once you've decided to go, the question is where. The best place to start your web search is at Israel Experience, a gateway to more than 130 short- and long-term programs in Israel. To find a program that suits your needs you are asked to supply criteria in a search engine. I found the engine quite finicky, so I suggest simply leaving it blank and clicking on the "search" button. That will produce a list of all the programs on the site. [www.israelexperience.com/]

Most of the major universities offer summer programs and longer-term programs. [http://tinyurl.com/49bxd] For example, Jerusalem's Hebrew University offers a four-week summer program focusing on the emergence of the modern Middle East. The wide-ranging evening symposia include "Middle East and Terrorism," "Music in the Middle East" and an evening of Oriental cuisine. [http://overseas.huji.ac.il/summer.php]

If you want to stimulate your soul as well as your mind there are yeshivot and religious institutions that offer courses guaranteed to give you a good workout. Organizations such as Aish Hatorah [www.aish.com/progsisrael/] and Neve Yerushalayim College [www.nevey.org] offer summer programs.

Beit Midrash: A Liberal Yeshivah studies the classic texts of Judaism in an "institution which believes in the principles of egalitarian worship and study." The Jerusalem-based institution operates a 15-day summer course focusing on Chumash, Halachah, Midrash, and Contemporary Israel for students 22 and older. [www.huc.edu/liberalyeshivah/] You can find links to other Judaic studies programs and Yeshivot for men and women at the Hillel – Getting Back to Israel site. [http://tinyurl.com/6w4xr] as well as at Maven. [http://maven. co.il/subjects.asp?S=174]

Ha-eem ata rotzeh lilmod ivrit? (Do you want to learn Hebrew?) Sure, you can pick up a smattering of Hebrew if you tour the country, but if you'd love something more intensive, try Ulpan Akiva based in Netanya [www.ulpan-akiva.org.il/] or the University of Haifa. [http://tinyurl.com/6baoz]

Next week: learning about the country while getting dirt under your fingernails.

UJA FEDERATION

The Jewish Education Report

Spreading the word on Jewish Education

A new marketing committee created by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is considering sweeping recommendations to promote the value of Jewish education and encourage more parents to enrol their children in Jewish schools.

Chaired by Michael Davis, a BJE board member, the committee is assessing the suggestions of a BJE-sponsored marketing conference late last year that brought together professional educators, education volunteers, marketing experts and informal education specialists.

l to r: Suzanne Kling, Communications Officer, Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, BJE chair Baila Lubek, Michael Davis, chair, BJE Marketing Committee.

BJE marketing committee member Sidura Ludwig at the recent marketing conference.

Many of the recommendations focused on the importance of nursery schools and kindergartens as Jewish education entry points. Others stressed the growing influence of grandparents in financing Jewish education for their grandchildren; the link between formal and informal Jewish education (camps and youth groups); the need for more community events to showcase the benefits of Jewish education; the significance of school alumni and outreach to those who are only mildly affiliated with the Jewish community.

"This committee is an exciting development for BJE and the entire community," says Davis. "It's not only because of the innovative ideas before us, it's also because of the broad-based coalition that we're creating for a common cause."

The marketing committee represents a multi-faceted approach to facing the challenges confronting Jewish education, according to BJE chair Baila Lubek. BJE committees are working with schools on tuition fees and funding opportunities and discussing the issue of school funding with the Ontario government.

BJE has also developed a strong relationship with the Boston-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) which assists cities and schools to expand day school enrolment.

Marketing committee recommendations will be sent to all marketing conference participants for their comments before being reviewed again by committee members.

Family Education promotes lifelong learning

Mishpacha. Family. The heart and soul of Jewish life.

It's also the name of a special program funded by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and currently thriving in more than half of Toronto's supplementary schools.

Mishpacha: Jewish Family Education is all about fostering lifelong Jewish learning and making it a vibrant family matter.

"Education can't happen in a vacuum," explained the BJE's Chari Schwartz, "and the Mishpacha program unites students and their parents with the school, institution or synagogue to better enable families to live more involved Jewish lives." It also creates networks of families who celebrate holidays and life cycle events together.

Judy and Michael Litvak know about the sense of community family education provides, first-hand – and many times over. Active members of Temple Sinai, the Litvaks have participated in that synagogue's Parent and Child Education program (PACE) with five of their six children; the option didn't exist for their eldest, Corey, now 24. "Each of our children (Shayne, the youngest, is now eight) experienced the program differently and that's what kept it fresh for us," Judy noted.

Dr. Ira Schweitzer, Temple Sinai's director of education, founded the PACE program 14 years ago and insisted that each grade level have several different versions of curriculum topics to avoid repetition for the parents.

Beyond additional programs for the congregation's middle and high-school students and their parents, PACE spans grades three through six and Schweitzer is pleased to say the family drop-out rate is negligible. He compared the parents' role in their child's education to airplane safety, explaining, "on an airplane, you're instructed to secure your oxygen mask first; similarly parents must feel secure in their own knowledge, for their kids to follow suit."

Michael and Judy wholly embraced PACE with their large family. "It's become such a big part of our family experience that, if Michael or I are busy, we schedule a grandparent to attend the session, maintaining adult continuity," Judy said. That reinforces the importance of Jewish education in a real and compelling way. "My parents had no idea what I learned at Hebrew school, although it was important to them that I be educated," Michael observed.

It's a generations-old mixed message made more pervasive by increasing demands on two working parents and the hectic pace of modern life.

Programs like PACE, however, are making a difference. As Schweitzer explained, "we're not satisfied just delivering parcel-post Jewish education. Parents today need to understand you can't just drop off and pick up a package; you must be personally involved in wrapping it."

According to the Litvaks, PACE takes the traditional commitment to study one step further by demanding that Jewish parents learn with their children in addition to teaching them.

A Graduate's Journey from Bathurst Street to Jerusalem

By Rochelle Kahn

It may seem a long way from Bathurst Street's Eitz Chaim Day School to the Knesset offices of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in Jerusalem, but not to Shalom Lipner. Lipner, a graduate of Toronto's Eitz Chaim and Yeshivat Or Chaim, made aliyah in 1987 and joined the Prime Minister's office three years later.

Currently serving as Sharon's assistant foreign policy advisor, but on sabbatical in Boston, completing a Wexner Fellowship at Harvard, Lipner has no doubt that his personal and professional choices have "always been informed by the values imparted to me during my day school education.

Shalom Lipner

"From an early age," he continued, "the combined influence of family, teachers and community instilled within me a love of Torah, Israel and the Jewish people – steering me toward aliyah and public service."

Lipner credits his educational experience with giving him a uniquely Jewish perspective on the world and "providing a moral, spiritual compass that continues to guide day school students long after they graduate."

Graduating from Or Chaim in 1983, he plunged into a very different environment at the University of Toronto. "Day School prepared me for the academic rigor and I was confident in integrating the university culture with my Jewish identity, without compromise," he said.

That confidence was critical to success and Lipner advises students making similar transitions today to encounter the outside world without fear, while remaining true to their Jewish values and ethics.

Lipner believes that effective, modern day schools must address learning to live with diversity. "We need full engagement on all pressing issues of our time," he stressed, "not denying or circumventing conflicts, but addressing them head-on."

He advised that an honest, candid approach to education is the best way to handle challenges confronting today's committed Jewish youth in secular society. "Pretending that dilemmas do not exist will not make them disappear," Lipner said.

Lipner describes his years in Jewish day school as an invaluable asset for his comprehensive and far reaching role in the Prime Minister's Office. He also feels that growing up as a Canadian Jew has given him a much-needed tolerance toward others and appreciation of their divergent viewpoints. "I've brought some Canada to Israel – an understanding that people needn't agree on everything but must reach out and form coalitions, for the sake of achieving shared objectives and living together in peace. Tsunami and Tzedakah - Our Children Respond

By Rochelle Kahn

The response was swift, sincere and unstinting. When students returned to Toronto's Jewish day and supplementary schools after winter break, their attention was riveted to the tsunami disaster and what they could do to help the tens of thousands of victims.

From a children's clothing and toy drive at Bialik Hebrew Day School to a walkathon at Netivot HaTorah, from a massive Battle of the Bands challenge at CHAT's Tanenbaum Campus to Temple Kol Ami's loose change drive to cash collections at She'arim Hebrew Day School, Jewish School students, parents and teachers are living the concept of Tikun Olam – healing the world.

And tying the tsunami to tzedakah in schools across the GTA has extended well beyond raising money.

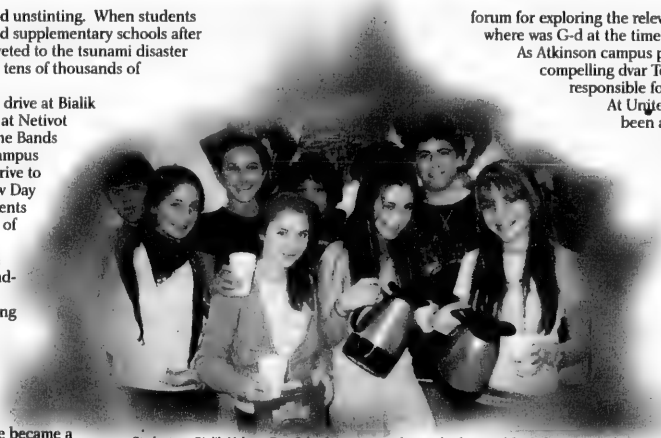
In addition to innovative fundraising efforts - including a hoola-hoop contest and a bead-in (creating and selling bracelets), Leo Baeck Day School used the tsunami as a springboard for discussing core theological questions. The middle school Rosh Chodesh Shevat service became a forum for exploring the relevant, recurring question with which the students grappled: where was G-d at the time of such a disaster?

As Atkinson campus principal Jan Lapedus explained, "Rabbi Michal Shekel's compelling dvar Torah reassured the students, explaining that we are all responsible for doing G-d's work and answering the cry for help."

At United Synagogue Day Schools, prayer and discussion have also been as significant as fundraising efforts. Jewish studies director Ami Sabari spoke about integrating Torah study and prayer into mitzvot. "It is essential to tie learning and praying to actual doing," Sabari said.

Elysa Cohen is principal of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, the only such educational facility for Toronto's growing inner-city Jewish community.

"Our kids have a unique challenge, living in a diverse community within a community, comprised of many different religious affiliations, family structures, cultural and economic backgrounds," noted Cohen. "Students from grade one through six came forward, wanting to know more and do something to help. Our teaching emphasized the Jewish obligation to take care of people globally, not just classmates, family and fellow Jews. The tsunami disaster taught our students that regardless of age or distance from the scene, we can all make a positive difference."



Students at Bialik Hebrew Day School were among thousands who raised funds for tsunami relief.

An Early Start to learning life's lessons

In the 1980s, a popular essay stressing the fundamental importance of life lessons learned in kindergarten swept North American pop philosophy. Early childhood educators agree that, beyond the rich potential these first years provide, pre-school can have a huge impact on shaping a child's spiritual and emotional development.

"Pre-school is the ground floor and getting in on this level Jewishly opens up tremendous opportunities to build lasting impressions and connections," stressed UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education consultant Ruth Rohn. "Increasingly, Jewish parents are recognizing the enduring advantages Jewish pre-school affords their children," she said.

Rohn, a former preschool teacher who now works with teachers in ongoing BJE-supported professional development programs, describes Jewish pre-school as a resource for all Jewish families.

For families where Judaism is practiced at home, Jewish pre-schools support and reinforce the family's own Jewishness in a hands-on and meaningful way, Rohn said. "There is something profoundly moving to young children, having their sense of belonging extended, as they see the Jewish values they are taught at home reflected in their school community."

As well, for Jewish parents who may not have had the benefit of a Jewish education, Jewish pre-school offers them an opportunity to grow in Jewish knowledge and identity alongside their children. "Our teachers must be family-oriented, picking up and acting on the teachable moments for our parents as well as our students. Partnership between school and family is important, especially when it comes to Jewish education, because whatever is supported by the family will take root," Rohn noted.

There's a wealth of preschool options in the Greater Toronto Area, housed in day schools, supplementary schools, synagogues and community centres, representing all streams of Judaism.

Defined as nursery school or junior and senior kindergarten, today's Jewish pre-school teaches young children Jewish values and practices plus Hebrew language skills and introduces them to a vibrant connection with Israel. The experience is designed to be activity-based, engaging children and their families in the development of a strong, positive Jewish identity and kindling a love of Judaism.

An upcoming community pre-school program, sponsored by UJA Federation on March 10 , 7:30 p.m., at the Lipa Green Building, will showcase Toronto's various Jewish schools and invite parents of pre-schoolers to learn more about what each has to offer.

"It's our second annual pre-school orientation night," said Barbara Barak, senior coordinator, Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST), which is organizing the evening with BJE.

"This year, we're featuring representatives of affiliated schools and after-school programs to answer parents' questions directly."

Rounding out formal and informal discussion, Options in Jewish Education will present Planting the Seeds, a short video detailing the recent experiences of parents deciding on their child's first foray into formal Jewish education.

For more information or to RSVP, call 416-635-5600 or e-mail jinfo@ujafed.org. JIST will also e-mail a copy of the question/answer period, following the program, to anyone unable to attend.

Congregation Habonim, 5 Glen Park Avenue

Dr. Efraim Zuroff is the world's foremost expert on the subject of Nazi war criminals still at large. He founded OPERATION: LAST CHANCE, which investigated hundreds of suspected Nazi war criminals from eastern Europe. The program, which was initially launched in the Baltics and Ukraine, is now operational in Poland, Romania, Austria, Croatia, Hungary, and most recently Germany. Dr. Zuroff, an award-winning author and authority on the Holocaust, is an expert on the Orthodox Jewish community's response to the Holocaust and has advised the Rwandan government in its efforts to bring the perpetrators of the Rwandan genocide to justice.

לפני כשנה נפטר המשורר נתן יונתן, האיש שאחראי לשורות נפלאות כמו "חופים הם לפעמים נעגועים לנחל", "זהו שיר ישן על אניטה וחואן", "אם זר קוצים כואב זה מה זאת אוהבת". המפעל האחרון טרם מותו של יונתן היה תרגום שיריו לאנגלית עם המשוררת-מתרגמת ג'ניס סילברמן-רביבו. לאחר מותו נמשך המפעל כשהכוונה היא להוציא את הטקסט העברי מימין והאנגלי משמאל. ואז החליט המו"ל, אילן גרינפילד מהוצאת "גפן" הירושלמית שיהיה מעניין לצרף תקליטור משיריו של יונתן בשתי השפות. וכך הגיע הסיפור אלי. האלמנה נילי יונתן ביקשה ממני להפיק תקליטור עם שירי נתן יונתן שהלחנתי בביצוע להקת "האחים והאחיות". הלהקה שהתאחדה אחרי עשרים‌שנה וחזרה להופעות, כוללת את סוזי מילר, שעלתה ב 1970 מקליפורניה, ושרה נפלא באנגלית. וכך הקלטנו את "כמו בלדה" ו "אם העולם" באנגלית בביצוע חדש ומדהים.

".....חֲבָקִי וְצַחֲקִי,
חַמֵּר וְחַמְּתְקִי,
קוֹלוֹת הָאֲנָשִׁים, פּוֹקְבֵי הַזְּמָן,
הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ וְהַיָּם,
הַלֶּחֶם, הַעוֹלָם,
וְכָל מָה שֶׁהָיָה נִשְׁאָר

Aliyah the theme of new photo exhibit

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Aliyah is Israel's lifeblood. Without it, the pre-state Zionist movement might have shriveled and modern-day Israel could not have prospered.

"Faces of Aliyah", a travelling exhibition of photographs by Aliza Auerbach, reached the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre last week.

Merrily spilling into the adjoining Second Cup cafe, it focuses on the movement of Ethiopian, Russian and Central Asian Jews to the Jewish state. Co-presented by the Israel Aliyah Centre, it runs until Feb. 21.

Auerbach's black and white photos are stark and to the point, and capture the gravity of a moment.

The majority portray Ethiopians from Operation Solomon onward, both in Ethiopia and Israel, as well as in transit.

In one of her best photographs, which speaks volumes about their traditional rural society, Ethiopians clad in white billowing robes descend from an aircraft that has just landed in Israel.

Three additional photos show Ethiopian women carrying infants tucked into sacks on their backs. The children look blissfully comfortable.

In a plane stripped of its regular seats so that the greatest possible number of passengers can be accommodated, masses of Ethiopians prepare for the flight to Israel.

And in an image that conveys the bureaucratic side of aliyah, an Ethiopian girl, her forehead pasted with a label on which the number 70 is scrawled, awaits processing.

At a transit camp somewhere in Ethiopia, people pick at plates of food, and at an assembly point in an open field, Ethiopians fill the back of a truck.

Two more photos portray a middle-aged Ethiopian man with a quizzical look and a wizened old woman wearing a necklace. In a striking photograph titled The Queen of Sheba, a proud young woman, flanked by fellow Ethiopians, holds an umbrella over her head.

Auerbach's photo of separate groups of new immigrants in a reception centre, the Ethiopians on the left and the Russians on the right, addresses the cultural gap between these communities.

Her Russian portfolio is equally evocative.

At Moscow airport, a man sporting a broad-brimmed beret and a salt-and-pepper moustache waits for his departure. And at a train station in Moscow, a Russian family bids farewell to friends who have come to see them off.

In an unusually framed photograph also taken in the Russian capital, four immigrants reach toward each other in a hearty toast.

Auerbach's Central Asian photographs are rich in detail.

Immigrants finish last-minute packing in Baku, Azerbaidzhan. An elderly man in Tblisi, Georgia, sits on his bed, his suitcase on the floor. A woman in an undisclosed transit camp is seen with her pots and pans, jumbled up on a mattress. A teacher in Samarkand, Uzbekistan, who has chosen to stay behind, cries as if her decision to forego aliyah has robbed her of her very existence.

These are strong photographs, but Faces of Aliyah would have been more inclusive had it included North American aliyah.

The exhibit moves to the northern JCC after its run at the downtown JCC.

RAISING MONEY FOR TSUNAMI RELIEF: Grade 5 students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre helped raise money for the tsunami relief effort in Asia as part of their derech eretz peer helper program. Cans were placed in each classroom for contributions from students and teachers, and a total of $640 was raised. Seen with the cheque for UJA are, from left, back row, Shira Ander, Aidan Little, Daniel Welkowics and Adeena Zeldin; front row, Carly Factor, Nessiya Freedman and Kevin Jacobs.

With great sorrow we announce the death of

at home, on Tuesday, January 18, 2005 at the age of 74, after a long battle with colon cancer. Mendel is survived and greatly missed by his loving and devoted wife Rachel, his children who were honoured to have him as a father, Marc, Karen and Iris, his daughter-in law Andrea, sons-in-law Sidney and Robert, his sister Anna Greenberg, and his brother Arie Schwartz, his grandchildren who loved their "Sabbie", Ariel and Max, Joshua, Austin and Jordan, Emma and Sarah, as well as by his many nieces, nephews, and extended family and friends. Mendel was a kind, gentle and talented man who lived for his wife, children, grandchildren and his entire family. He will be in our hearts forever. We wish to thank his nurse Bonnie Cole, Dr. Kendall and his homecare worker Christina Feliciano for their kindness and care during this difficult time and to all our family and friends for their support. If you wish to honour his life please make a donation to one of the following the Temmy Latner Palliative Care Centre, The Canadian Cancer Society (Colon Cancer) or one of Mendel's favourite charities Canadian Friends of Yeshivath Hadorom (contact Shaarei Tefillah)

WINOKUR, LUBA ז"ל

Peacefully at the age 89 on Monday, January 24, 2005, at North York General Hospital, Toronto. Luba, beloved wife for 51 years of Jack, who pre-deceased her in 1997. Dear mother of Paul and his wife, Sherry Cohen, and cherished grandmother of Stephanie and Neal. Luba will be sadly missed by her nieces, Connie and Debbie and by great-nieces, Julia and Jacqueline. A funeral service was held on Tuesday, January 25 at Pardes Shalom Cemetary, Temple Sinai Synagogue Section. A private shiva will be observed. In lieu of shiva gifts or flowers, donations to the Alzheimers Society 416-967-5900 would be appreciated.

Will baby boomers trigger a health-care crisis?

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

As they grow older and near retirement, baby boomers increasingly find themselves at the heart of the ongoing debate about health care.

Media reports typically speak of an impending crisis, a health-care system burdened by an aging population without enough funding and human resources to support it.

While there is evidence to support some of these prognostications, academic research presents a more nuanced perspective.

Today, the boomers – the generation of people born between 1947 and 1966 – number nearly 10 million in Canada. From 2012 to 2031, they will reach the age of 65.

What does that mean for the healthcare system?

According to a discussion paper for the Commission on the Future of Health Care in Canada, it could mean a rise in health expenditures.

"The aging of the Canadian population has been a contributor to the rise in… many chronic conditions and per capita health expenditures rise very rapidly after 65," the report states.

Indeed, health-care costs are projected to leap from $61 billion in 2006 to $81 billion in 2041. Because boomers will be retiring during this period, there is concern about a dwindling pool of health-care professionals, as well as less economic activity to fund bulging health-care costs.

But the report notes the following: "Population aging has been and will likely continue to be a secondary source of pressure on health expenditures relative to non-aging factors."

Raisa Deber, a health-policy management and evaluation professor at the University of Toronto, agrees with the discussion paper's view that the boomers are not at the root of projected ballooning health-care costs.

"I'm not scared about the boomers," Deber says.

She cites research from the Canadian Medical Association Journal that shows it isn't simply old people that place pressure on health care, but rather ailing people, in all age groups.

"In every single age group, you find a very small proportion of people account for most health-care spending," Deber says.

"For women over 75, the healthiest 10 per cent of that age group cost less than $20 per year, whereas the sickest group spends something like $80,000 per year."

U of T economics professor David Foot says Deber's example is compelling, but he emphasizes the big picture.

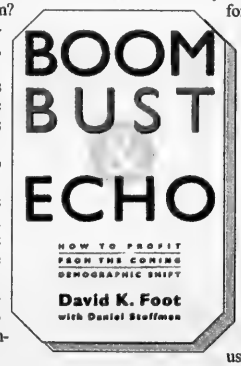
"You have to look at the average person and that there is a high correlation between age and health-care status," Foot says.

Foot, co-author of the best-selling book Boom, Bust & Echo: How to Profit from the Coming Demographic Shift, says the major boomer impact on healthcare will come in the 2040s.

"The peak of the boom starts to emerge in the third decade [of the 21st century] and the fourth decade is when it really hits, [as boomers start to] use hospitals in their late 70s and 80s," Foot says.

The concern about the 2040s is therefore whether tax revenues and related sources of income for the government will be able to foot the health-care bills of elderly seniors.

A study authored by Robert Brown, director of insurance and pension research at the University of Waterloo, explains that the money invested in RRSPs and other retirement plans by boomers could provide a significant funding source for health care.



"As the baby boom retires, they will take their registered income out of their retirement plans and pay income tax thereon, just when the government will need the money to pay for health care," the report states.

"[RRSP's and RPP's] are the perfect deferred tax asset that will some day pay for increased demands for health-care funding in an aging population."

Foot says the real "Achilles heel" for the boomers and health care is the droves of boomers who will retire.

To that end, demographic trends indicate the number of physicians in Canada over the next 50 years could decrease by 30 per cent.

That could translate into a physician shortage at a time when boomers will make significant use of the health-care system.

Part of Foot's solution to that potential problem is for the education system to foster more health-care professionals.

"Now is the time to get teenagers interested in health care," he says.

"These are the children of the boomers and we need them in our health-care system. We need to expand admissions to health-care programs now."

Deber says less pressure would be placed on the system by boomers and others if there was an improvement in disease prevention.

"People are getting ill from things that are quite preventable, such as diabetes," she says.

"I'd like to see a lot more focus on how you prevent diseases."

Whatever approach the system takes, Deber stresses it must be nuanced.

"It's not a one-size-fits-all situation," Deber says.

"We have to be flexible."

It is important to find alternatives to a child's negative behaviour

By AVI BERNSTEIN

Walking down a tree-lined path, I felt a sudden gust of wind as an 11-year-old cyclist whizzed by me. In front of me was a 16-year-old girl in a jeans jacket. She had long, black hair, and there was a bored look on her face. The young cyclist got to the end of the path, turned around toward his older sister and screamed, "You know, I can ride with one hand." There was a big smile of accomplishment on his face.

The girl was silent.

"Did you see how fast I went?"

"Who cares," yelled back his sister.

Our 11-year-old hero did not give up.

"I can ride without any hands."

A few seconds of silence followed and then his sister replied, "I can ride with two hands. WOOOOOOOOO!"

This is called mirroring. Just as a mirror acknowledges a person's physical existence, so do social experiences or people close to you acknowledge your importance.

It starts from birth. Mother holds her baby close, a twinkle in her eye, wordlessly saying, "You are the most important thing in the world. In fact you are the world. You are so unimaginably important that I will attend to your every need. Nothing you do will go unnoticed."

That twinkle gives the infant security, reassurance and love. It fulfils the newborn. For the rest of the child's life, nothing he will do can supply him with as much credit and acknowledgement of his inner goodness, wholeness and worth as he receives from his parents for simply existing as a newborn.

A child's strongest desire is to belong. Mirroring gives a child the feeling of belonging 100 per cent. Children of all ages will do almost anything to get that feeling (adults too).

A child may feel discouraged when trying to belong in a positive way, and discovers that negative behaviour is often rewarded more than positive behaviour. At first, he may feel he must overachieve in order to be noticed in competition with an older sibling. If that approach is unsuccessful, the discouraged child will find other "easier" ways to become important. But a parent can show their child positive ways to get acknowledgment.

For example, if a child misbehaves in a grocery store, his mother can involve him in shopping, which gives him some important responsibility. Then the child almost never causes trouble again. The child who misbehaves in class, not sitting still for a minute, can turn into the best-behaved student after the teacher gives him a leadership role or responsibility in class.

Why does this work? When presenting him an alternative behaviour option, what changed inside the child?

Is it a reaction, new motivation or perhaps the achievement of a goal?

We all know what it is like to reach a hard-earned goal. In the process of achieving the goal, we are less concerned with why we are not there yet and more interested in the most efficient way to get there.

When we look at our children's behaviour, we wonder why they are behaving that way.

"Why did he hit his sister?"

"He could have waited just another minute and gotten one, too!"

"Why didn't he join them? He knows how to play that game. He's even good at it."

"She hasn't been herself lately."

The list never ends.

The real answer is ahead, not behind in the past. Not "why?" rather "for what?"

The child is always moving toward a goal, not just responding or reacting. He is one step ahead even if he does not always know it.

"If I don't play with my team, those older kids will feel bad and invite me to join their game."

"If I hit her and she screams, mommy will get off the phone and pay attention to us."

"If I pretend that I am depressed, my parents will demand less of me."

It is important to analyze what our children say or have our children evaluated. It is even more important to ask, "What does my child gain from this behaviour? What is his goal?" You will be able to understand the most complicated of situations then. When behaviour motivation is clear to the parents, an effective alternative to a child's negative behaviour can be found.

Adolescence: a time of change for children, parents

By ORLI GOLDBERG
Special to The CJN

Adolescence is a time of ambiguity, uncertainty, exploration and experimentation. It is a time of rapid physical, social and emotional change. In fact, at perhaps no other time in life are medical issues so interconnected with psychosocial issues, in either their origins or their consequences. Drug addiction, suicide, depression, anxiety, sexually transmitted diseases and unplanned pregnancies are all significant medical problems that are the direct result of adolescent behaviours.

"Adolescents aren't just big children, and they aren't just little adults," says Dr. Miriam Kaufman, staff pediatrician in the division of adolescent medicine at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Perhaps that is why there is a branch of medicine that has emerged over the last half-century, devoted to the understanding and management of issues unique to teenagers. The initial development of adolescent medicine was based on the biological and behavioural changes associated with puberty and their effect on disease.

More recently, societal changes and legal considerations have greatly enhanced the importance of this specialty that provides optimum care and studies the health and welfare of adolescent patients.

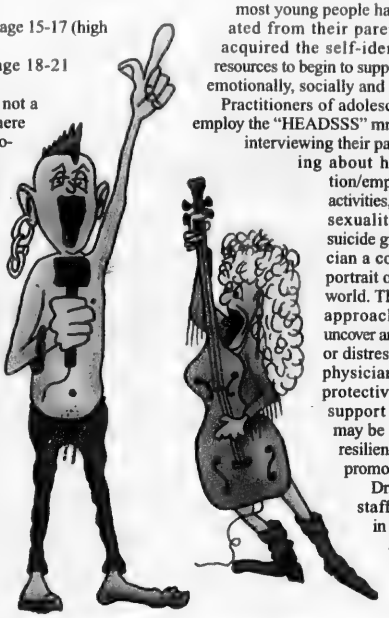
Adolescence can be conceptualized in three psychosocial developmental phases:

- early adolescence: age 12-14 (junior high years);
- middle adolescence: age 15-17 (high school years);
- late adolescence: age 18-21 (university years).

As adolescents are not a homogenous group, there is a wide variation in biological and emotional growth, and the three stages tend to overlap. The ability of the adolescent to successfully make the transition through the phases is a critical factor in overall adjustment and happiness.

There are several tasks that characterize the development of adolescents, including:

- becoming independent of one's parents;
- adopting peer codes and lifestyles;
- developing an acceptance of one's body image; and
- developing a unique self-identity (sexual, moral and vocational).



By the end of adolescence, then, most young people have been liberated from their parents and have acquired the self-identity and the resources to begin to support themselves emotionally, socially and financially.

Practitioners of adolescent medicine employ the "HEADSSS" mnemonic when interviewing their patients. Inquiring about home, education/employment, activities, drugs/dieting, sexuality, safety and suicide gives the physician a comprehensive portrait of the patient's world. The HEADSSS approach has helped uncover areas of concern or distress and enabled physicians to identify protective factors and support systems that may be used to foster resiliency and health-promoting practices.

Dr. Karen Leslie, staff pediatrician in the division of adolescent medicine at the Hospital for Sick Children, says that practitioners of adolescent medicine "meet adolescents where they're at. We try to respect, listen and help adolescents make responsible decisions for themselves."

Leslie reinforces the idea that parents can help ease their teens' transition from childhood to adulthood.

"Try not to respond solely to kids' behviour," Leslie advises. "Rather than reacting to the behaviour, try to understand the reason for the behaviour."

For example, if your children dye their hair blue, instead of becoming enraged over the hair colour, try to understand why they dyed their hair a strange colour in the first place.

"Listen to your teen, and continue to set age appropriate limits," Leslie says.

Although she cautions against being too authoritarian, she believes many teenagers want limits, but the rules must be negotiable. Instead of dictating, include the teens in the discussion of some rules to help them learn to work through problems and arrive at solutions that may involve compromise.

Finally, although parents should be encouraged to spend time with their teenage children and provide guidance and direction, they should also respect their children's need for privacy and autonomy.

New fitness facility caters to the whole family

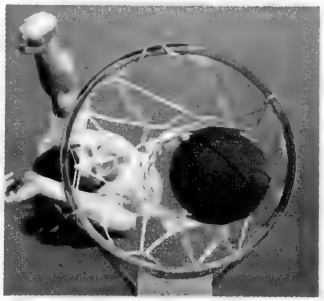
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Having fun and getting fit together is the philosophy behind the new Pavilion Health Club, Canada's largest family fitness facility, due to open in the spring.

The 145,000-square-foot facility located in Vaughan at Dufferin Street and Highway 7, includes two hockey arenas, an aquatic centre, aerobic, spinning and yoga studios, a cardio theatre, kids' and teens' facilities, a spa, and child-care services.

The theory behind the new facility, says Joshua Gofman, the general-manager, is for families to learn to live an active lifestyle, work out simultaneously and make fitness a regular routine in their lives.

"Children and parents can visit the Pavilion together and take part in activities specifically created for their fitness level and areas of interest," he says.



Within the children's fitness centre is a 3,000-sq.-ft. space with special exercise stations that provide a variety of games and prizes, he says.

"The teen pavilion accommodates youth from 13 to 17 years old, and includes a basketball court and rock climbing wall. Football, ping-pong and basketball are all fun games, and there is not a computer or gameboy in sight," he says.

The personal trainers focus on the specific needs of all the health club's members, and help them achieve their fitness goals, says Penny Hounsome, the health centre manager.

"[Our] professionals will consult their members about nutrition, fitness level, and physical and emotional well being.

"We really want to put the personal back into personal training," she says. "Our program is different than what people are used to. We offer specialized testing and programming to ensure your sweat [and] time [are] well spent."

Tracy Winter, the public relations director, says families need to make fitness a priority.

"Instead of dropping off and picking up their children, parents can take a yoga class, for example, while one child takes a dance class, and another goes swimming. Everyone can do something for themselves at the same place and at the same time."

While the two hockey arenas are now open, the facility will open a temporary fitness centre in February. For information, log on to www.thepavilion.ca or call Winter at 416-903-2667.

Discuss care with older parents before emergency strikes

By SHERRI NEFSKY
Special to The CJN

It is hard to know when it is time to start worrying about the health and wellbeing of aging parents and relatives.

When is forgetting where they put something a cause for concern and when is it simply a lapse? When are changes in their behaviour normal and when are they a signal of bigger issues?

Assessing these matters is hard enough when you live close by. The situation becomes more stressful, however, when you live in a different city. It is easy for things to go unnoticed when you don't get to see each other often.

Sylvia Nathanson, a social worker at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, says regular phone calls and visits are the best ways to stay on top of the situation and monitor any changes in mood, habits and behaviour.

"Memory loss, they are beginning to look frail, the apartment doesn't look as clean, the fridge doesn't look as full – these are all early signs," she says.

Audrey Miller, a social worker and the managing director of Elder Caring Inc., which provides care for seniors in their homes, says that often families don't deal with care decisions until something happens, such as a fall or emergency hospitalization. At that point, decisions are rushed and the elderly patient may have little say in the outcome.

A good time to begin talking to an elderly person about how she or he is coping with living at home may be when everything seem fine, she says.

Nathanson recommends taking an approach that won't put the other person on the defensive. That includes using wording such as "I can see it is getting harder..." and being understanding.

If you are not getting a response, she suggests asking family members or friends to drop by or telephone. They may be able to offer added insight into the situation.

Pride and a fear of becoming a burden may keep a parent from dealing with age and health-related issues.

Nathanson says elderly people are sometimes relieved when they get the chance to answer questions truthfully. They might never ask for help themselves, but may open up when approached.

Nathanson suggests addressing issues such as having an up-to-date will and deciding power of attorney while competency is not an issue. That is also the time to discuss how and where an elderly person wants to spend the next few years.

Miller says it is important to try to find out everything you can about government and city services and organizations for the elderly before your parent needs them.

Look also to the local Jewish community and Jewish Child & Family Services. For the challenge of caring for elderly parents who live in different cities, contact national groups such as the Alzheimer's Society.

If an elderly person is living alone, some simple steps can help to make her or his home safer, alleviating the absent child's fears of the parent falling or having an accident. Miller recommends the federal government's Safe Living Guide, which is available online. Baycrest Centre has its own publications, including Caring for Your Loved One, for caregivers with relatives who have Alzheimer's and other forms of dementia.

Many small things can improve the quality of life for elderly parents who want to be on their own but need a little help. Meals-on-wheels or day programs at community centres can keep them active and healthy. Arranging for help with cleaning, repairs and errands can make a difference, especially in the winter. Even making arrangements for them to pay their bills can ease your worries.

You may think your parent should come and live with you or move to the city you call home, but that does not mean he or she will agree. "Moving is hard when you are young. It is harder later on," says Nathanson. Your parent may be unwilling to leave a lifetime of friendships and memories.

If a parent has lost a spouse or has become more physically dependent, the opposite may be true. That may be the time when a parent wants to be near you.

And of course, whether you and your relative live close together or not, deciding when or if a nursing home is necessary is a difficult emotional decision for everyone involved.

"It is important to respect the wishes of the parent. Respect is an issue. Allow a person to make the decisions they can make," says Miller. "Have them involved and hear what they have to say."

Changing the way we cope with aging

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The aging process can be slowed down, according to personal trainer Beverley Burdeyney.

"There is no old age," she says. "There is only neglect. Regardless of your physical challenges, you can always be your personal best, whatever that level may be."

Burdeyney, 64, has spina bifida and is living proof that her philosophy can lead to good health.

A youthful-looking and energetic grandmother of four, Burdeyney has been working in the Toronto area as an exercise coach for more than 20 years. Her clients are of all ages, many of them over 65.

"It is important to design programs for them that address their physical capabilities. Good health means taking responsibility for yourself – replacing bad habits with good ones. Individuals need mentors," she says.

Burdeyney points to John Glenn as a role model. At age 77, he was the world's oldest astronaut and handled the rigours of his space flight in 1998 as well as astronauts half his age.

Research indicates that walking or cycling for at least 20 minutes, three times a week, reduces the risk of death from cardiovascular disease and all other causes in men over 64, she says.

"I don't believe that physical activity is the only factor in having a great life. It is a very important part of a much larger equation, which includes sensible nutrition, the three R's – rest, relaxation, relationships – cultivating a sense of joy, remaining active and having a religious component, however one wishes to define it."

Burdeyney says one of her objectives is to help her clients create their own "dynamic central girdle," by strengthening the muscles of pelvis, abdomen and lower back. She compares the pelvis, abdomen and lower back to the foundation of a house. "If the foundation is strong and solid, then the building will

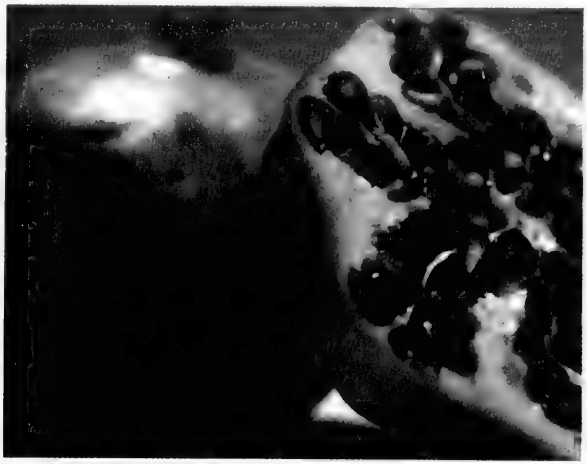
Study finds pomegranates have healing powers

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern



Many of us eat pomegranates only at Rosh Hashanah as part of our holiday tradition, but we should enjoy the fruit more often.

An Israeli study conducted in 2001 showed that the red fruit contains antioxidants that can reduce the risk of heart disease by lowering cholesterol levels, mediate high blood pressure, prevent the thickening of arteries and suppress some types of cancer.

Prof. Michael Aviram and his team of researchers at the Lipid Research Laboratory in Haifa have thus given new hope to those looking to improve their health naturally.

While this is a relatively new medical breakthrough, pomegranates have been used in traditional medicine for years.

"Aviram chose pomegranates for his study because the fruit has long been used in folk medicine in the Middle East, Iran and India for treating disease and infections and he suspected that some of its medicinal value could be due to antioxidants," wrote Martha Molnar, in an American Technion Society (ATS) release.

After the study was completed, the ATS, in association with the Israel Institute of Technology, released a statement indicating that "the daily consumption of pomegranate juice dramatically lowered oxidation of LDL cholesterol, leading to the elimination of plaques in coronary arteries."

In other words, according to the study, patients who consumed pomegranate juice, compared to patients who did not, saw a decrease in the rate of development of low-density lipoprotein (LDL or "bad cholesterol").

Researchers also observed that in patients who suffered from carotid artery stenosis (the thickening of arteries), the thickness was reduced by up to 30 per cent for those who drank the fruit's nectar, and increased by up to nine per cent for those who did not.

After a year of consuming pomegranate juice, subjects with high systolic blood pressure enjoyed a 21 per cent drop in their levels, the study showed.

Perhaps even more groundbreaking was a study done within the same organization later in 2001. An Israeli team led by Dr. Ephraim Lansky found that pomegranate seed oil triggers a self-destruct mechanism in breast cancer cells.

The study concluded the juice can be toxic to 75 per cent of estrogen-dependent breast cancer cells and half of non-estrogen-dependent cells, leaving normal breast cells unaffected.

Dr. Yvonne Yuan, a Ryerson University professor said she was not surprised at these findings. Pomegranate juice is a source of "catechins [flavonoid compounds with potent antioxidant capabilities] similar to those found in green tea, which may be involved with the health effects," she said.

The only question that remains is how the general public can get their hands on the juice that promises to improve the health of people affected by various ailments.

POM Wonderful, one all-natural pomegranate juice can be found in select grocery stores across Canada.

In Ontario, some A&P, Dominion and Sobey's grocery stores carry the product, or you can ask the store manager to order it. In Quebec, however, it is not yet sold.

Other brands are also available. If the store nearest you does not carry the juice, try ordering online.

Kosher and healthy: not mutually exclusive

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the most pervasive myths about kosher cooking, besides the suggestion that it is bland, unimaginative and old-fashioned, is that it is unhealthy.

True, many of our grandmothers used ingredients and techniques that to our modern sensibilities are anathema: shmaltz (rendered chicken fat), frying, petcha (calves' foot jelly), few if any green vegetables. Not to mention that heavenly concoction, also known as heart attack on a plate, gribenes – onions and chicken skin fried in shmaltz.

That does not mean, however, that kosher food is intrinsically bad for you. It's a matter of making sensible choices.

Cooking guru and CJN columnist Norene Gilletz has a simple, straightforward formula: calories in versus calories out. In other words, maintaining a healthy weight, and good health generally, depends on a combination of the foods you eat and the amount of exercise you get.

Keeping kosher may sometimes make it more challenging to have a healthy diet, especially when we look for prepared foods, but it certainly does not make it impossible. Emphasize vegetables, fruits (rather than fruit juice) and whole grains in the diet, and include the proper proportion of fats, proteins and carbohydrates.

Whole grains, such as kasha or oatmeal, are digested more slowly than refined ones, and therefore make you feel full longer. When you eat processed foods, the body doesn't have to work so hard. The blood sugar rises faster and then drops faster. You get hungry sooner, and with that comes the temptation to nibble. And how often do we nibble on carrots rather than on junk?

Chicken eaten without the skin, fish, and lean meats are good protein choices when cooked in healthy ways, such as roasting, baking or broiling.

Gilletz decried the fad diets that omit or severely limit certain categories of food. "Even fats are not bad. What matters is how much you eat and what kind." Use monounsaturated fats like olive and canola oil, or polyunsaturated fat like corn oil.

Cut down on sugar, salt and eggs, and incorporate more unprocessed foods like lentils and barley, she advised.

"That quintessential Jewish food, bean and barley soup, is very healthy," Gilletz noted, adding that it "nourishes the body and the soul."

So much of Jewish life and experience revolves around food – can you imagine Shabbat, a brit milah, a wedding or holy days without the meals that are a part of each one?

It is normal to associate food with nostalgia, warm and fuzzy memories of family holiday meals, loved ones who perhaps are no longer with us, candy doled out by a loving grandmother, the smell of sage stuffing or Persian kabobs. It is also common to find that certain foods make us feel good. Who hasn't dealt with upset or loneliness or anger by digging into chocolate cake or mashed potatoes?

There is nothing wrong with an occasional binge. It is unrealistic to expect to go to a party or a seder, or to lunch on Rosh Hashanah, and not somewhat go off what you consider a really healthy diet.

So what do you do?

One suggestion is to eat less or more lightly the day before and the day after the special meal. Get more exercise, not necessarily in a gym, but do such things as making it a point to climb stairs, walk instead of driving, stand to do chores instead of sitting down.

Choose wisely at the meal. Try to fill up on vegetables, salads and fruits. Ask to be served on a smaller plate – you feel as if you are eating more than you really are. (This works for any meal, by the way.) Then take a walk.

For your own kosher household, pay attention when you shop. Use fat free vegetable broth instead of milk in recipes; choose colourful vegetables like broccoli, spinach and tomatoes; find low-fat or no-fat cheese, sour cream and yogurt; buy more lentils, barley and whole grains; concentrate on chicken, turkey, fish and lean red meat such as lean ground beef, london broil, flank steak (if your kosher butcher sells that) or shoulder steak. Stick to unprocessed foods. Processed food tends to have more fat, calories and sodium than you need.

You might even try tofu or soy protein, which very often has a hechsher.

When you are planning the family meals, bear in mind the length of time you wait between meat and milk, especially if you have children. It might well be better to have meat at night, rather than during the day when it may mean waiting for dinner until some unpractical time.

Stay away from the rows of kosher junk food: if you don't buy it, you can't eat it.

It is easy to think that healthy eating is a modern phenomenon for the observant Jew. That is not true. The scholar and physician Maimonides, who lived between 1135 and 1204, wrote in his Sefer HaMadda (The Book of Knowledge): "The body being healthy is of the ways of the Lord, for it is impossible to understand or know the knowledge of the Creator while unwell. Therefore, one should keep away from things which destroy the body, and accustom oneself to healthy and curing matters."

Part of this regimen, he said, involves eating lots of whole grains and exercising.

Traditional, alternative care find common ground

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There was a time when many physicians and alternative health practitioners viewed each other with suspicion. However, these days there seems to be more common ground between the two groups.

"People would go alternative or traditional," recalls Dr. Sharla Lichtman. "The ideal scenario is to get the best of both worlds."

Indeed, Lichtman and her medical partner, Dr. Rochelle Schwartz of Genesis Professional Group, are among a growing number of physicians who view alternative health professionals as a complementary health service that can benefit their patients.

"We take a holistic and comprehensive approach to our patients, and medicine in general," says Schwartz. "We are traditional family practitioners practising traditional medicine, but in terms of a holistic approach, we work with a team of consultants that includes social workers, nutritionists, a dietitian, trainer and naturopath.

"Our practice is geared to wellness and preventive health," she continues. "We help our patients navigate the complex medical system… We're looking for the optimum care, whether it's a referral to another doctor or working with an allied health professional like a naturopath."

Lichtman offers a case in point where the naturopathic assessment provided the optimum treatment for her patient, a woman in her early 50s with a debilitating digestive problem.

Dr. Sharla Lichtman, left, and her partner Dr. Rochelle Schwartz

"No available traditional medical treatment made a difference in her treatment. I sent her to Dr. Ruth Anne Baron, the naturopath on our team because she has within her resources a battery of tests outside traditional options for physicians.

"Dr. Baron was able to discover a sensitivity in this patient and was able to offer her a treatment that completely cured her."

In addition to gastrointestinal disturbances, high cholesterol problems are also often referred to Baron, says Schwartz, noting that she has been working closely with the naturopath to help a male patient in his early 40s with a family history of heart disease reduce his cholesterol levels.

"He wanted a natural alternative to medication. He saw our dietitian. She looked at where his nutrition could be improved. The fitness trainer gave him an exercise regime and he also saw Dr. Baron for naturopathic supplements."

However, the patient was carefully monitored, Schwartz says, and when his cholesterol did not improve enough, she started him on medication. "He's taking a lower dose than I would normally start someone on. I'm hoping that in conjunction with the supplements Dr. Baron is giving him we can attain the target cholesterol levels."

This interdisciplinary approach typifies the preventive aspect of health care, the two physicians hope to achieve, says Lichtman, noting that before she and Schwartz refer to other colleagues, they do a thorough assessment of their patients, spending some three hours to get a clear picture of their emotional and physical health, family history, lifestyle and diet.

While the medically necessary services for Genesis members are covered by OHIP, Lichtman says her preventive evaluation and the assessment of the other team members are considered non-essential medical services and not within the provincial health insurance plan.

When they set up their practice, the two physicians were looking for a naturopath to join the team. After hearing Baron speak on alternative treatment for menopause they decided that she was the ideal candidate.

Naturopaths trained to work with doctors

"She had a similar philosophy to ours," Schwartz says. "Her treatment and diagnosis plans complement traditional medicine."

"It was very important to us that she not send contradictory messages to our patients," adds Lichtman.

Baron, who works out of the North Toronto Naturopathic Clinic agrees. "It never serves the patients not to have all their heath-care providers working together.

She says as a group, naturopaths are trained to work co-operatively with medical doctors. "We understand the challenges of medical conditions and the traditional treatments. If someone comes to see us on heart medication we're not going to take them off their meds."

The naturopathic approach is to work on all the aspects to make a patient healthier – through nutrition, supplementation, herbal medicine, acupuncture and counselling, she explains.

"We understand surgery and medication. We have basic medical training and in-depth training in drugs and natural medicine interactions."

Baron says she typically gets physician referrals for pre-existing health conditions like gastrointestinal disorders, adult onset diabetes, chronic recurrent infections and support for cancer to boost immunity. "Some patients have problems not easily solved through conventional medicine."

She says irritable bowel syndrome is a common referral.

"If a person is having bowel symptoms, I want to know that other conditions have been ruled out through tests. That's the advantage of working closely with medical doctors... Everyone working on the case knows exactly what the patient is dealing with."

Baron notes that physicians often send referrals to ease menopausal and perimenopausal symptoms because they are looking for a natural alternative to HRT (hormone replacement therapy).

Similarly, Dr. Penny Kendall-Reed, a naturopath at the Urban Wellness Clinic, a multi-disciplinary wellness centre that includes a medical doctor, says she gets more referrals to treat menopause and perimenopause since "HRT was discovered to be detrimental to women's long-term health."

She says she can prescribe herbal supplements that are much safer than HRT to treat mood swings, hot flushes and insomnia, typical menopausal and perimenopausal symptoms.

"Although conventional medicine is advanced, you can't treat everything conventionally," says Kendall-Reed. "Additionally, our treatment often complements a medical approach. For example, we can increase the efficacy of traditional antibiotics for an infection. While a patient is treated for infection, the naturopath can give something to boost immunity."

She says she gets physician referrals for many conditions, from the common cold to cancer immune support, weight and cholesterol management and thyroid problems.

"Obesity and cholesterol can be treated through diet and natural supplementation... We address arthritis by increasing the strength of existing cartilage, but we can't cure severe problems that might require a hip replacement."

Kendall-Reed has co-authored four health books with her husband, Dr. Stephen Reed, an orthopedic a surgeon. Published by Robert Rose, they span traditional and naturopathic medicine: The New Naturopathic Diet, Healing Arthritis, The Complete Doctor's Healthy Back Bible and The Complete Doctor's Stress Solution.

Stress expert teaches proper relaxation techniques

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Stress management can help those with some illnesses and conditions, according to expert Eli Bay.

Modern-day living is highly stressful and the body's way of reacting is to go into a "fight or flight" response, which is the equivalent of being on high alert, Bay says.

"Our bodies react to any kind of change – good or bad – in the same way it would react to the snort of a sabre-toothed tiger. And since we are in a constantly changing world, we are in a constant state of arousal."

When the body goes into the "fight or flight" response, there is a physiological response, he says, and blood pressure and heart rate go up and the digestive tract activity slows down.

In his stress-management courses, which he offers at the Relaxation Response Institute, Bay teaches relaxation techniques that shut down stress by slowing the heartbeat, lowering blood sugar and relaxing the muscles. "I teach people how to focus the mind and regulate their physical, mental, emotional and spiritual state," he says.

"The relaxation techniques impact on the internal brain chemistry, reducing anxiety, depression, and physical symptoms like constipation, heartburn, and asthma."

Stress management expert Eli Bay

The techniques Bay teaches – there are seven types – include a form of self-hypnosis, meditation and visualization, along with breathing techniques and muscle relaxation. "What I have done is taken what I know are good relaxation techniques from various disciplines and stripped them of their esoteric jargon and ceremony," he says.

Learning those skills has many advantages, from increasing one's concentration and academic standing to improving one's golf game, he says.

Before becoming a stress expert, Bay worked as an assistant to the minister of finance for the Manitoba government. He later did research in England for the World Jewish Congress. In the early 1970s he moved to Israel, where he met his wife Masza. The couple have two sons in their 20s.

Bay launched a stress management program shortly after settling in Toronto in 1978. He did two television series on stress management for TVO, which were marketed worldwide in the late 1980s and early '90s.

He recommends following a healthy diet and doing regular exercise to reduce stress, along with practising relaxation techniques.

Polio survivors may suffer from symptoms again

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

When Shirley Brazer's symptoms started in 1983, she hadn't even heard of post-polio syndrome.

"I had been fairly active – going to the gym, swimming 35 laps," she says. "Then I started to have the muscle weakness, the fatigue, the muscle pain. I didn't know what was going on."

Brazer grew up in the North End of Winnipeg and contracted polio when she was 13 years old in 1953. Her upper left side was paralyzed and she was isolated in her home for three months while she recovered.

With a nurse and a physiotherapist, she worked hard to regain her strength. Once she had recovered, she was encouraged to forget all about it.

"It was a different era. There were no [emotional] supports in that era. You got polio and you got better to the extent you got better. Then you jumped back into your life."

Thirty years later, in Toronto, Brazer's nephew told her about a documentary he'd seen on television about post-polio syndrome.

It was then that she began to consider polio could be affecting her life again.

"My neurologist had never even heard of it," Brazer says.

She was originally diagnosed with fibromyalgia, a disease that also causes muscle pain and fatigue.

Six months later, her doctor encouraged her to visit a respirologist at Westpark Health Care Centre, who specialized in post-polio syndrome. Brazer was finally diagnosed and began to get the support she needed.

"It can be very difficult," says Kimberly Dowds, the national manager for Polio Canada. "For a lot of survivors who had polio as children, there was a real stigma to having polio. You were taught to act normal because disability wasn't as accepted as it is now."

And yet, that attitude can get many post-polio sufferers in trouble.

Jan Nichols, who heads the Toronto/Peel post-polio support group, remembers how she ignored her symptoms until the day she fell and fractured her pelvis.

"I went back to work, but they said, 'Go home and get well.' That was two years ago and I've not been able to go back."

People living with post-polio in Toronto, have little financial support and therapy available through OHIP. And what is available is being cut back.

Two years ago, Westpark offered a post-polio clinic with physiotherapists, occupational therapists, social workers and treatment plans.

Brazer says she doesn't know where she'd be now if she hadn't had the initial support from the post-polio clinic.

"I feel very sorry for people who don't have that now," she says. "It's very hard to ask for things if you don't know you need to ask for them."

"There's an attitude in the medical community," Dowds says, "as well as in the general public that polio is a dinosaur disease and will become extinct. But we've got quite a number of [polio survivors] who will be around for quite a while. And now we have a second wave of survivors, people who have come to Canada who have contracted it in their home country."

As well, many Canadians who lived through the polio epidemic in the 1950s may have unknowingly contracted a mild form of the virus, and could be susceptible to post-polio syndrome.

"If these symptoms sound familiar, and you remember polio being in your neighbourhood," Dowds says, "even if you don't remember getting sick at the same time, go get it checked out. You may have had non-paralytic polio."

However, she also stresses that the disease should be diagnosed by a specialist such as a neurologist or a physiatrist – someone who specializes in physical and rehabilitation medicine.

And while there is no cure for post-polio, there are ways of living an active life with the syndrome.

Nichols says she's learned not to overdo it, and that energy conservation is the key to living with post-polio.

Post-polio symptoms

- Unaccustomed fatigue, that requires you to take a rest in the middle of the day, or earlier.
- New joint and muscle pain.
- Muscle weakness and/or loss of muscle use, even in muscles that didn't bother you when you had polio.
- Respiratory problems and/or swallowing difficulties.
- An intolerance for cold that causes muscle weakness, and sometimes a burning pain and/or discoloration of limbs.
- Psychological stress because you don't know why you are experiencing these new aches and pains.

Dr. Stephen Kraft

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resume their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Dr. Kraft has authored or co-authored more than a dozen publications on Botox®, and has lectured on that subject to Ophthalmologists, Family Physicians, Optometrists, Neurologists, and Allied Health Personnel.

CURRENTLY: Fellow, Royal College of Surgeons of Canada.

Men often ignore health care at their own peril

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The penchant of men to tough it out when it comes to a persistent, nagging pain, or to make excuses for not seeing a doctor may be killing them. Or at least making a bad situation worse.

Research by organizations that track men's health shows that men are less likely than women to take care of their health, particularly when it comes to visiting doctors on a regular basis. They may even take better care of their wives and children than they do of themselves.

The results of this haphazard attention to their health often show up in medical statistics that cross national boundaries. Men in Canada, the United States and Britain tend to participate in risky behaviours (smoking, drinking, driving too fast), ignore warning signs of impending health problems, like chest pains, and irrationally shy away from simple medical exams (the cold finger prostate test) that could nip a growing problem in the bud.

They also tend to die, on average, younger than women.

Seymore Applebaum has seen this reluctance of men to confront their own mortality many times. A health advocate who promotes wellness issues for different groups, Applebaum says, "Men don't like to talk about their health. It's a real struggle doing these issues to get men to talk about them. They're busy with other things in their lives."

Applebaum, who organizes health forums for community organizations, says, "It's uncomfortable for them. A lot of men haven't gone to see a doctor for awhile. They may need to change their lifestyle."

Applebaum has seen the reluctance to visit a doctor in his own family. His 21-year-old son recently visited his general practitioner for the first time since he was 12.

Young men who may be in good health should nevertheless develop a "good, confidential relationship with a doctor, so they can – when they're in their 20s, 30s and 40s – consult with them," he says.

Applebaum has found that some men "almost get an aversion from going."

Many feel uncomfortable in a doctor's office, surrounded by older people and women, he says.

Seymore Applebaum

"Men seem to put up a psychological barrier to doctor's visits, the blood work that must be done, the tests and examinations they feel are intrusive," he continued.

Some feel they if they join the Y, work out and eat better, they'll get better on their own, he adds.

An article published on the website of the Rochester, Minn.-based Mayo Clinic reports that the threats to men's health are mostly preventible. Heart disease is the biggest killer, followed by cancer, stroke, accidents and chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases, like emphysema and chronic bronchitis.

In New York, the Commonwealth Fund, a private foundation that supports independent research on health issues, reports that "an alarming portion of American men fail to get the medical care they need to stay in good health. A significant number of men do not get routine checkups, preventive care or health counselling, and many ignore symptoms or delay seeking medical attention when sick or in pain."

A survey conducted for the fund found that three times as many men as women had not seen a doctor in the year prior to the study.

One of three men did not have a regular doctor and more than half of all men had not had a physical exam or blood cholesterol test in the previous year.

Among men 50 or older, 60 per cent had not been screened for colon cancer and 41 per cent had not been tested for prostate cancer.

The survey also found that "even when they do visit the doctor men are often too embarrassed to discuss health concerns.

"Society's demand that men be strong and stoic can be harmful to their health if it causes them to ignore what their bodies are telling them and avoid seeking medical care," says David Sandman, program officer at the Commonwealth Fund and lead author of the study. "Strengthening men's connections to the health-care system and sensitizing physicians to male health concerns could bring improvements in men's longevity and well-being."

Dr. Sharla Lichtman, medical co-ordinator at the Genesis Professional Group in Concord, Ont., agrees that "men tend to be less focused on their health than women. But in general, the population is becoming more aware of paying attention to health, like healthy lifestyles and pro-active, preventive care."

Lichtman, who has "a fair amount of male patients," says "many men seek medical care at the coaxing of their wives or girl friends."

What's more, she's found that "men will seek attention when they're not well. It's not as common for men to go to a physician for a general assessment or an annual physical."

Lichtman believes concerns connected to child-bearing brings women into doctors' offices at a younger age than men. Young women also know they need a regular PAP smear to check for cervical cancer and other irregularities, and breast examinations.

As men get older, they need to be concerned about colon and prostate cancer and should have a doctor check them for those illnesses, she says.

Even at a younger age, men should have their blood pressure, blood sugar and cholesterol levels checked, have moles evaluated and discuss lifestyle issues, such as stress management, with their doctors. "If you catch high blood pressure and cholesterol it could prevent heart attacks and stroke," Lichtman says.

First Jewish weight loss camp set to open

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The first ever weight loss and fitness program for Jewish youth in North America is set to open this summer at Camp Gesher, a Habonim Dror camp located in Cloyne, Ont.

The Excel health and fitness program, running from July 27 to Aug. 17, is dedicated to improving the health and well-being of campers by focusing on non-threatening group activities, non-competitive physical sports and games, and nutritional education such as food planning and preparation.

Shaul Zobary, director of Camp Gesher, said that together with seven staff members including physical education teachers, a certified nutritionist/social worker and a dietitian, the 28 boys and girls, ages 12 to 15, will work on such issues as self-esteem, healthy eating habits and exercise, all within a Jewish environment.

The menu, designed by a dietitian, will include lean meats, low fat milk, dairy products and a wide array of fresh fruits and vegetables.

"Jewish children have different dietary needs and restrictions than the general public – the camp is kosher but there is no mashgiach – and our program will allow them to combine a healthy lifestyle with a Jewish lifestyle," said Zobary, director of Camp Gesher for the past six summers, and a physical education teacher with the Toronto District School Board.

The program will have its own kitchen staff to work with the Camp Gesher chef, and campers will have a separate seating time, joining Camp Gesher for Friday night Shabbat dinner and services.

A designated shaliach will be working with the program in order to incorporate Jewish and Israeli themes, he said.

Zobary stressed that there is no weigh-in or weigh-out. "The campers' success will be measured by their lifestyle changes and important life skills learned. We're going to help them see the world differently.

"At the end of camp, each camper will receive a folder with information to help them continue their progress. We plan on following up with programs throughout the year," he said.

Zobary, who has a PhD in physical education, said he's had the vision for such a camp for several years.

"The program is designed so that campers will begin to feel comfortable with themselves, because kids who are comfortable with themselves have less tendency to be overweight."

Campers will take part in four activity periods each day, as well as overnight trips, and many activities will take place at nearby Bon Eco Provincial Park.

"An important phrase in Judaism is nefesh briah, b'guf bari, a healthy body supports a healthy mind. That is our philosophy."

This is the time in their life to make changes, said Zobary. "If we look at kids that age, we can see how they will be in the future. This is an informal way to change that future."

Zobary has "no doubt the camp will be a success.

"They will feel liberated to be doing things they've probably never done before. It's a great opportunity for kids who need a different type of program."

For information on the Excel Program, call Zobary at 416-633-2511 or 1-877-443-7437.

Fad diets are bad for your health

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fad diets often do more harm than good, says Lindsay Beder, a registered holistic nutritionist.

A graduate of the Canadian School of Natural Nutrition and a certified personal trainer, Beder says that although people may lose weight quickly, the diets eventually backfire.

"The biggest challenge to weight loss is keeping off the weight, and that is next to impossible on a fad diet.

"What happens is the person embarks on a journey of yo-yo-dieting – losing weight and gaining weight, and losing and gaining again. That slows down the metabolism and makes losing weight more difficult," she says.

She stresses that people need to make a lifestyle change that includes healthy eating.

"You need to change the way you think about food, and you need to know what to eat. Once that happens, your body will react properly," Beder says. "I realize it's a slow process, but in the end it is the only one that works."

When clients comes to her for help she fills out an 11-page assessment form designed to find imbalances in their body.

"Depending on their symptoms, we can discover what [nutrients] they're lacking, and we can put together a plan that will restore balance. Sometimes that's through food and supplements, and sometimes through food alone," she says.

Lindsay Beder

In general, she advises clients to stay away from sugar, white flour and caffeine.

"They add extra chemicals to your system, and these chemicals are hard to eliminate.

"Caffeine contains a chemical that holds on to the sugar you eat during the day, so it holds your body back from losing weight. If you cut out caffeine, and drink green tea, you can lose five to 10 pounds in a year."

Low fat foods generally contain a lot of sugar and sugar turns to fat. "Check out the sugar content in foods," she suggests. "Low fat items are not necessarily the best choice."

Beder says eating the right foods is the first step to combating cravings.

"You crave foods because you're not eating the right nutrients. As well, your body craves foods you give it. If you feed it sugar, it wants more sugar. If you keep doing the same things, your body will get stuck in a rut."

Within the last couple of years, more and more people have made health-conscious goals, she says.

"They haven't been living a healthy lifestyle, and now they want to do something about it. It's never too late to make a commitment to change your lifestyle."

Botox is the fastest growing trend in cosmetic surgery

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

If someone had told you 10 years ago, that people would be paying doctors hundreds of dollars a year to inject a muscle-paralyzing toxin into their faces, you'd probably have thought they were crazy.

But today, Botox, or botulism toxin strain A, is making the facelift a thing of the past, and it is one of the fastest growing trends in cosmetic procedures in North America.

Although the procedure needs to be done every four to six months, it costs less and gets quicker results than surgery, with minimal pain and recovery time.

While the Botox craze in Hollywood is a fairly new phenomenon, this toxin has been used to help people with overactive muscles for years.

Since 1978, doctors have been using the botulism toxin as an alternative to surgery for patients who suffered from strabismus (misaligned eyes), but only within the past few years has it been used to fight wrinkles.

Botox is also widely used to treat muscle spasms in the face, overactive muscles in eyebrows, nose, cheek and neck, and it can be used to shut down the sweat glands of those who suffer from excessive perspiration.

The toxin, derived from a bacteria that, in high doses, can cause fatal food poisoning, can also be used to relieve the excessive muscle stiffness of children with cerebral palsy, and can be used to treat some forms of migraine headaches.

But with all the benefits that Botox provides, Dr. Stephen Kraft, an ophthalmologist who was the first doctor in Ontario to use the toxin in 1985, says using Botox to treat wrinkles is "the most common elective procedure in North America."

Although this is a common procedure, Kraft said the risks still need to be considered.

Kraft warns that one of the possible adverse effects is a "spread of Botox to facial muscles in addition to the one intended to be injected, which causes weakening of these adjacent muscles," but he reassuringly adds that this is only temporary, generally lasting up to four to six weeks.

If too much of the toxin is injected into a certain muscle, around the eye, for instance, it can weaken other, nearby muscles, causing eyelids to droop. The same can happen near the mouth, where weakened muscles can lead to drooling.

But injecting Botox is such a simple procedure that many physicians feel it does not need to be reserved for specialists.

This has caused a controversy in Canada, pitting some cosmetic surgeons against some family physicians.

In an article featured in the July 2001 volume of the Medical Post titled "Cosmetic Surgery Controversy," Celia Milne examined the issue of family physicians practising the more common cosmetic procedures.

"The short length of training programs is a big issue in the controversy. A Botox training course might take place over a day or a weekend," Milne wrote.

Kraft – who studied with Dr. Alan Scott, the originator of the Botox treatment methods for eye muscle and facial muscle disorders – said it's important that a doctor have experience, proper training and familiarity with the muscles in the area being injected.

be stable and stand erect," she says. "The same is true for your body."

Exercise coach Beverley Burdeyney

Burdeyney was recently appointed director of International Council of Active Aging (ICAA) for Ontario. The organization, made of professionals in the retirement, assisted-living, fitness, rehabilitation and wellness fields, is active in 23 countries.

Seeking to change the way we age, ICAA provides information, resources, education and tools to aging baby boomers and seniors.

"Along with my private practice, my association with ICAA now allows me to teach many people rather than only teaching one-on-one, and to reach out to the media," she says. She refers to herself as an "ambassador of wellness; aging, of course, but living dynamically."

This way, says Burdeyney, she can change the way we cope with aging. "I want to help make people 50-plus become more aware of the need to take care of their health."

Unique insurance plan helps terminally ill

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

How financially prepared would you be to deal with the stresses of a serious illness?

With cancer, heart disease and other illnesses a reality for millions of Canadians, many people are asking this question and looking to Critical Illness Insurance as a helpful solution.

Unlike other forms of insurance, Critical Illness provides a lump sum payment and allows people to use the money as they see fit. It also offers the unique benefit of fully refunding clients if a claim isn't made.

"I'm quite satisfied with it," says Arna Feldman, a 55-year-old dental hygienist who bought a $10,000 policy that would provide a $250,000 payout.

"If I got sick… I wouldn't want to depend on anybody… and [Critical Illness Insurance] gives you the freedom for home care, for nursing care or for anything," she says.

More than a third of Canadians will develop cancer and about one-quarter of Canadians currently suffer from stroke-related illnesses.
